The man, or the Government, that abjures the Law of God, contained in the Decalogue (or Ten Commandments,) or any single precept thereof, whether the Fourth, Sixth, or Eighth, we consider a wicked man—a wicked Government,—for he who willfully violates one Commandment breaks all; the Law of God is an unit.

Now it is a fact, painful to every pious heart, that our Federal Government, sometimes, and the Editors and Proprietors of "Sunday Papers" of the city of New York, and through the United States, always, treat the Fourth Commandment as though it were abrogated, or was never of any binding force upon any nation, or individuals that ever composed a nation, except the Jews; and we add (mournfully,) many Editors and Proprietors of the Daily Press, apparently justify their course.

In the language of a popular Editor, in reply to our objections to his advertising "Sunday excursions," in his Journal, perhaps they will say, "we do not believe in any HOLY SABBATH!"

However, nothing is more certain than this, that human opinion will never change the Unchangeable Law of the Unchangeable God; his Moral Law remains, every precept of it, in all its binding force upon all nations to whom it is made known. And Jesus Christ Himself declares concerning the Sabbath, that it was "made for man"—for universal man,—in all climes. And woe, we say, to the nation or the man, that has not, and chooses not to have and keep, a "Holy Sabbath,"

We would address our fellow-citizens of every class, in terms kind and respectful; but pardon us, gentlemen of a Sabbath-desecrating Press, if we should seem to fail in our respect toward so large, so learned, so talented a class as yourselves, when we say our disgust,—nay, more,—our indignation, is excited, when we read in one of your columns an eloquent essay in favor of morality and religion, and a proper observance, perhaps, of the Sabbath—a terrible scourging of the profligacy of the times—a manifestation of a holy abhorrence at the moral and political corruption of men in high places—a prophesying of woe and ruin, without speedy and radical reformation; then in the next find an advertisement or several of them, inviting the public, or at least showing them, for fifty cents, how they may very agreeably (if wicked enough,) break God's Fourth Commandment by an excursion on this, that, or the other Steamboat, to this, that, or the other Island, Village or Grove!!!

And still more is our disgust and indignation excited, when "from early morn to high noon" on each Sacred Day, our eyes, and ears, and hearts, are pained with sights and sounds unholy, presented and made by the thousand ragged, ignorant boys, that cry through our streets at the top of their voice, the "Sunday papers," proclaiming the sin of their employers and patronizers, if not of the whole city, that unchecked and unrebuked, suffers such bold, unmitigated iniquity to live and grow more rife;—proclaiming, we say, their sin like Sodom—knowing no shame!

Can it be consistent with either Christian character or Patriotism, thus, to disturb a Christian community by such an abominable traffic on the "Lord's Day;" and increase the degradation of the Youthful Venders whom True Religion, Philanthropy, and Patriotism would exert their influence to place each Lord's Day in Sabbath schools and Churches, to learn the way to respectability on earth, and eternal happiness in Heaven?

"Consistency is a jewel." Vainly, indeed, in our estimation, will you advocate "Republican Principles" or pure morality; vainly expect to perpetuate our Free Institutions, Political, Civil, and Religious, and extend them over the world, while the main power of the Press in this city and country levels so destructive an axe at the root of the Tree of Liberty—the Law and Gospel of God, by a PRACTICAL (at least) abrogation of the Fouth Commandment, in refusing to "Remember the Sabbath Day, to keep it holy," and Government, to great extent does likewise. Go, search the records of all nations, look today over the map of the World, mark the Political, Civil, Moral, and Religious condition of its myriad nations, and see if there is, or ever was one that had, or now has, a stable and Free Government, an enlightened and happy people, only in proportion as they had, or have, "respect to all the Commandments of God," or, if you please, to his "Holy Sabbath?" For, although "all the law and prophets hang" on the First and Second Great Commandments, (the sum of which enjoins love to God and man,) yet all history will prove that neither these, nor any other Divine Precept, has been, or will be remembered and kept, with fidelity, where there has not been and is not a "seventh part of time set apart as sacred" for their consideration—the hearing of "the glorious Gospel of Jesus Christ," and the worshiping in Spirit and in Truth, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. And now, Gentlemen, having for the sake of a good conscience, the good of our common country, the eternal salvation of immortal souls, for which we labor and pray, and the honor and glory of Him who has said, "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths and reverence my sanctuary," very plainly and kindly expressed in this Address, our Individual sentiments on this matter of "Sabbath Desecration," we hope that, although our single name, (unknown to fame as to yourselves,) is appended, you will nevertheless be as powerfully and happily affected by its truthfulness as if it were signed by all that vast array of the names of the wise and good in this city, whose views, on this subject, we are confident, coincide with ours, and are derived from a sound interpretation of the "Lively Oracles of the Living God."

With these sentiments, we remain your servant, For Christ's sake, J. B. HORTON.

N. B.—Those Editors to whom this Address may be sent, that shall not deem it incompatible with their interest, will please to publish it. J. B. H.

Remarks.

The foregoing displays a commendable zeal, and as it is "not incompatible with our interests," we comply with the writer's request to publish it. But do you know, Mr. Horton, what it is which the Fourth Commandment teaches? Presuming that your zeal is for God, rather than for yourself or your party, we will undertake to show you. The Fourth Commandment teaches, that the seventh, not the first, day of the week is the Sabbath. You, and all your fellow-helpers, assume that the thing taught is, that the seventh part of time is holy to the Lord. But you misapprehend the meaning of the Commandment.

When it is said, 'The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God,' the meaning is—not, that the seventh day is the Sabbath which the Lord thy God appoints for thee to keep, but—that it is the Sabbath which the Lord thy God himself observed. On this point almost every body blunders, understanding the Commandment as if it read thus: 'Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, beginning upon such day as may be designated; but the seventh day, after these six days of labor, is the Sabbath which the Lord thy God appoints for thee to keep. In it thou shalt not do any work,' &c.

Now a candid analysis of the Fourth Commandment will show, that the meaning is something very different from this. The first words of the commandment, 'Remember the Sabbath-day,' refer to a well-established historical fact. 'The Sabbath-day' is synonymous with 'the Rest-day,' and refers to some particular Rest-day, known and rendered notable in history as such. The remainder of the Commandment clearly sets forth, and specifies, the particular Rest-day to which reference is had. It sets forth, that the reference is to that notable Rest-day which the Creator himself observed, when he had finished his work. That Rest-day, in its weekly returns, is the one which we are commanded to remember and keep holy. Is it not so, Mr. Horton?

Now, we will submit it to yourself, whether the Rest-day which the Creator himself observed after he had finished his work, was not the last day of the first week of time. And we will submit it to yourself, whether that is not the day which the Creator "blessed and sanctified." You yourself shall say, whether he did not "bless and sanctify" that day, because that in it he rested from all his work. And you yourself shall be the judge, whether this reason can possibly apply to any other day of the septenary cycle. All the other days were working days—were they not?

It comes then to this: That the seventh, or last, day of the first week of time is the one in which the Creator rested—the Sabbath, or Rest, of the Lord thy God; that upon this day the Creator put his blessing, so that in its weekly return it might be holy and a blessing to man; that this is the only day of the seven, which can with any propriety or truth be spoken of as a 'sanctified' day; that this, and this only, is the one which the Creator requires us to remember and keep holy in its weekly return.

The meaning of the Fourth Commandment is, therefore, as if it read thus: 'Remember the Rest-day—the day designated in the History of Creation as such—to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh is the Rest, which Jehovah thy God observed—after he had finished his work. In it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested on the seventh day. Wherefore the Lord blessed the Rest-day, and sanctify it, so that in its weekly return it might be a blessing to man, for whom it was made.' (Mark 2: 27.)

Now the precise thing which the Fourth Commandment requires, is the commemoration of the Creator's Rest. And why commemorate his Rest? Because, in so doing, we commemorate the work which that rest implies. In other words, by commemorating the Creator's rest, we commemorate the whole work of creation, and celebrate it as the finished production of an almighty hand. To commemorate the work of creation, therefore, is the duty which the law of the Sabbath enjoins. And it enjoins it, in order that man may be saved from the atheistic folly of supposing that the worlds came into existence by chance, or by some power other than that of an all-wise Intelligence; and from the heathenish folly of supposing that the matter of creation was eternal, or that the gods of the heathen, or any other being but the God of Israel, had any thing to do in the formation of the universe. As a testimony against Atheism and Idolatry, the Sabbath was given to man.

And now, Mr. Horton, tell us whether you are not now, and have not all your life been, in the transgression of the Fourth Commandment. Does not your own example tend to the perpetuity of that ignorance which has so long prevailed in regard to this subject? Do you not, every seventh day of the week, go about work, and say, (by your example, at least,) that it is not the day which God has pronounced holy? Do you not thus give the lie to Him who has said, 'The seventh day IS the Sabbath?'

We do not suppose that you mean to be an example of disobedience. We doubt not, that you are actuated by more honest intentions. The tone pervading your "Address," is proof that you are much distressed on account of what you suppose to be highly dishonorary to God. But since "the man that abjures the Law of God, contained in the Decalogue (or Ten Commandments,) or any single precept thereof, whether the Fourth, Sixth, or Eighth, is a wicked man"—these are your own words—you are, if you knew it, in rather an awkward predicament. We would advise you to consider, therefore, whether it is not time to take the beam out of your own eye.

"Pardon us, if we should seem to fail in our respect toward so large, so learned, so talented a class," as the one to which you belong, "when we say, our disgust,—nay, more, our indignation, is excited, when you give us an eloquent essay in favor of a proper observance of the Sabbath," and then, before you have done, begin to show the people "how they may very agreeably (if wicked enough) break God's Commandmant" to keep holy the seventh day, by just substituting the practice of Sunday-keeping instead.

"And still more is our disgust and indignation excited, when 'from early morn to high noon,' on each Sacred Day, our eyes and ears and hearts are pained with sights and sounds unholy, presented and made," not so much by "the thousand ragged, ignorant boys," as by the well-clad, intelligent men, whose carts and carriages, and open stores, and thronged markets, and military parades, and bands of music, and places of amusement, indicate a complete forgetfulness of the fact that God has said, "The seventh day is the Sabbath—in it thou shalt not do any work." This frightful state of things, which ignores the existence of an institution designed as a constant testimony against Atheism, you yourself, Mr. Horton, have helped to perpetuate.

"'Consistency is a jewel.' Vainly, indeed, in our estimation, will you advocate" obedience to the law of the Sabbath, while by that very law you stand condemned. "Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself?"

SPIRITUAL CHRISTIANITY.

The question may be started, perhaps, Is there any such thing as Christianity that is not spiritual? The reply is, Yes, to a great extent. Many who make great pretensions are mere theorists, who labor hard to concoct and defend a religious theory without any regard to and love of the truth. Many, who have been trained up amidst the light, have from various motives professed the truth, without experiencing any real change in their souls. They have light, but not heat, or an enlightened understanding, without a sanctified heart—a natural without a spiritual perception of the truth. Some occupy prominent and important stations in the Church of Christ, who know enough, as far as the natural understanding is concerned, and an intellect instructed and informed by religious training and discipline, who are mere wordlings after all, as grasping and oppressive and selfish as if this world was the ultimatum of their existence.

There is such a thing, however, as Spiritual Christianity; and it may be that the time is at hand when the chaff and the wheat will be tested and divided. What is this kind of religion of which we speak? is a question of vital and everlasting moment. It has its origin in a renewed nature, by the Spirit of God. It is spiritual, or divine life infused into the soul by a divine influence. One great principle it includes is faith—a faith that soars above reason and philosphy, and lays hold of truths above their reach—a faith that embraces Christ as the only and all-sufficient Saviour, and trusts in his merits alone for acceptance and justification, and holds him with a pertinacious grasp—a faith that looks over all the grandeur and wealth and honors of this world, and fixes its eye on the substantial and everlasting realities beyond the ken of human vision—a faith that rests on the eternal God, and rejoices in all his divine perfections—that trusts without hesitation in his divine promises, as all "yea and amen in Christ Jesus." This faith leads to a humble, holy, and active life in the service of God—awakens pure and divine love in the soul, supreme to the infinitely blessed God, and warm though subordinate to all believers in Christ. Its fruits increase in quantity and perfection as life advances, until the possessor becomes prepared to take his stand among the glorified, and unite in the noble and harmonious songs of heaven's choristers.

The individual who has this spiritual christianity drinks deep at the fountain of living waters, and opens his mind to receive those divine influence which the Spirit imparts, and those blessed truths of revelation and divine mysteries at which men cavil and dispute, and which they endeavor to reduce to human comprehension, or reject them as unreasonable and unphilosophical. He rejoices in all the arrangements of providence, as embracing the most glorious results towards the kingdom of Christ, and designed to overturn eventually all that is antagonistic to human rights, happiness, and salvation. He says emphatically, "The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice." Amid the fluctuations of time's affairs, his mind is stayed on the almighty arm of Jehovah; and amid the afflictions and pains and disappointments of life, he makes God his refuge. He possesses a spiritual bias of soul, and his thoughts are tending towards divine subjects. He loves the worship of God, and to unite with the congregation of the Lord in hymns of praise and in imploring his benediction. When sinners return from their follies, and give evidence of the renovating power and grace of the divine Spirit, the same kind of emotion is felt as the angels in heaven know. The breathings of prayer from the previously prayerless soul, are music in his ear, and the early buds and flowers of piety are more fragrant and beautiful than the opening and fragrance of spring. Nature he loves, with its ample supplies and beauties; but the fruits of grace are better and more enduring. The advancement of the kingdom of Christ is the grand consideration with him, and whatever changes transpire amongst the nations and kingdoms of the earth, his eye is watchful of the effects and issues of them all on that spiritual kingdom which is destined eventually to extend to the ends of the earth, and absorb all by its hallowed and blessed influence. Every indication of this event is hailed with joy, though it be brought about by the breaking up of old thrones and the demolition of worldly grandeur which may have excited the greatest wonder and dazzled the eyes of countless multitudes. The development of the scheme of grace and love, in its extent and glory, is watched with peculiar care, and in the exercise of a strong faith in the divine promises, he is looking to the end with intense interest, when the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord Jesus Christ.

This is the Christianity which is divine in its origin—the only true and genuine—that which alone is pleasing to God and beneficial to mankind. May we all know what it is to be "born again"—experience the transformation into the "divine nature" of which the apostle Peter speaks—and finally, after having done the will of God, be qualified for the employments and enjoyments of the future state. G. R. WHEELER.

"WHOM SHALL I SEND?"

The prophet, in his vision concerning the glory of God, heard a voice from the Lord saying, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" The prophet immediately responded to the voice, "Here am I, send me." The message was of painful import. The people had disregarded the instructions and reproof of God, until his patience was exhausted, and in their stubbornness was foreseen the storm of God's righteous displeasure, which was soon to be demonstrated in the fearful manner which subsequent history has disclosed. They were to see, indeed, but not perceive, that Christ was their Messiah and King; to hear, indeed, the gospel, but not understand its glorious import, revealing life and salvation through his merits, and atoning blood. Their hearts were to be made fat, through pride and bigotry, "till the cities be wasted without inhabitants, the houses without men, and the land utterly desolate."

This has literally transpired, and through long-succeeding ages, they have drunk the cup of trembling to the very dregs. The corruption of Christianity has contributed to protract this season of darkness, despair, and death. But the night is now passing away, the shadows recede, the dawn of the day of promise streaks the horizon, and the rays of Christian light, so long refracted, are beginning to pour their vivifying influence on the darkness; "for the time to favor Zion, yea, the set time, is come. The servants of God take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof." Their hearts go out in earnest solicitude for their salvation.

Seventh-day Baptists have long and anxiously watched the movings of Providence, and many hearts have longed to participate in the amelioration of their circumstances, and to have the pure gospel carried to them as in a clean vessel, and to place the waters of life to their famishing lips. But "hope deferred makes the heart sick," and dims the prospect. They have, however, been recently cheered by the report that something was soon to be done by the Board of Missions, and measures resolved upon; but it has not been formally announced by the organ of the Board, and doubts are prevailing in some minds as to the measures and purposes of the Board. A desire exists to know whether competent and satisfactory laborers have been secured. We have not heard the call audibly made, by the Board, "Whom shall we send, and who will go for us?" Nor has a programm of the measures to be carried out been presented to the churches, as we are informed; and it is difficult for me to conceive how the response desired can be expected, "Here am I, send me." Inquiries are made, whether or no an industrial institute is to be connected with and embraced in the mission? We have assurances, through some, that such is positively the plan, while others manifest doubts as to what is the design of the Board in this respect. Doubts were publicly expressed, some time since, whether qualified missionaries could be obtained for this mission. Under these circumstances, I would inquire, are the Board prepared for action? and are the denomination fully prepared to sympathize with them?

—Since the above was indited, I have observed an editorial article communicating information to several inquiries, and stating two resolutions of the Board, and an unofficial statement made as to the real condition of the case. In the mean time, I would suggest, that although we have long anticipated this mission, and anxiously waited, it will be wrong to enter upon it unprepared. The people expect to support it, and the offerings already made assure us that it will be supported liberally. Then let them be informed what the wishes of the Board are, and what are the measures proposed with respect to the mission.

Should difficulties still present themselves, as to the qualifications of ministers to fill this mission, I will suggest, as a measure for consideration, that the number be increased to six or eight, comprising one minister and his deacons, and others sufficient to compose a small church, and endowed with talent for discipline, with a view to instruct in schools of science and in the arts, such as printing, with a press for the use of the mission, and mechanism sufficient for agricultural pursuits, and agriculture as a staple interest, so far as it can be made to subserve the cause of Christ and the object of the mission. Such a mission might at first require a liberal outfit, but would, with economy, be able to lighten the burden by supporting itself in part, and such a part as the society should instruct them to do. While the seekers after truth would be rendered independent of their oppressors, and converts instructed in the arts of enlightened civilization, such a mission would divide the responsibility that devolves otherwise on the ministry, and secure to the Board the best appropriation of their means, and economy in their disbursements; and the number we have mentioned, male and female, might be sufficient, without incurring an onerous burthen on the denomination. In making the above suggestion, I do it with deference to the wisdom of the Board, but with the concurrence of many of my brethren. J. M.

THE CHURCHES IN OHIO.

Eld. Joshua Hill, late of Farmington, Ill., having removed to Montra, Shelby Co., Ohio, is desirous of being joined by other Sabbath-keepers; and with a view of turning their attention in that direction, gives the following account of the country.

"As Seventh-day Baptists are located here, I think this region offers as many inducements for others of our people to locate here as are offered at any point in the West. There are two churches which have worship regularly on the Sabbath, viz., Jackson and Stokes. The Port Jefferson, Northampton and Piqua Societies have gone down, on account of removals and changes of location. Many from those societies have settled within the bounds of the Jackson and Stokes churches, and are so situated that if united they can exert a wide and salutary influence. The Jackson Church is located in the center of the township, and those connected with it own probably one third of the territory and one half of the improvements. They commenced here some sixteen years ago, when the land was covered with heavy timber, and are now nearly all landholders, and as nearly on a level in point of property as the people of any community I ever knew. There is a block meeting-house near the center of the town, a steam sawmill half a mile east of the meeting-house, and a village growing up, with two small dry-goods and grocery stores. There is also a village at Montra, two and a half miles west. At this place mechanics are much needed, and would probably do well. The country is generally healthy, and those who take proper care of themselves have nothing to fear on that score.

"The facilities for education are as good here as at any other place in the county, except at Sidney, the county seat. The school section of this town was sold recently, for $4,600, which is to be appropriated to the use of schools in the town, in addition to the other school funds. A school has been kept in the meeting-house some two and a half years, which has given good satisfaction, and done much to improve the people. It is not at present in progress; but it is believed that a similar school can be supported among us most of the time.

"I commenced laboring here as a missionary on the first of July, and found the people in a scattered, desponding, and discouraged condition. Many had almost given over in despair; but the Lord changes not, and therefore his people are not consumed. Though they may travel through afflictions, yet the Head of the church has said that the powers of darkness shall not prevail against them. Brotherly union and confidence has been to a good degree restored, saints have been made to rejoice, and some, we trust, have been born into the kingdom of grace. Five have been buried with Christ in baptism, and others are expected soon to follow. Fourteen have joined the churches. To God be all the praise. Pray for this weak branch of our beloved Zion."

ANOTHER SUNDAY PAPER.—The leading Catholic paper of this City, The Freeman's Journal, now issues an edition on Sunday—a movement which seems to surprise some of our Protestant neighbors. It ought not to surprise any body who is at all familiar with history, or with the Catholic controversies of the day. Scarcely any thing is plainer from history, than that the Catholic church has played an important part in the abolition of the Sabbath and the elevation of the Sunday festival; and in almost every controversy we have read between a Protestant and Catholic, this claim has been set up, and it has been maintained that the observance of Sunday can not be justified without resort to the Fathers and the traditions of the Catholic church. If that church has a right to make a Sabbath of Sun-day, has it not an equal right to decide what is the proper manner of using the day? And does not consistency require that those who accept the Sunday as a Sabbath on Catholic authority, should also hear to them in regard to the manner of keeping it?

"SABBATH ACCIDENTS."

A few years ago it was common to see accounts of accidents happening on Sunday paraded in the religious papers as proof positive that to work on that day is sinful and likely to bring down upon the sinner summary judgment. As an offset, we began to collect and place together, under appropriate headings, notices of accidents on the seventh day, and found enough, one would think, to satisfy any reasonable man, that of this species of argument there is at least as much for the seventh day as for the first. Of late we have seen but few notices of accidents on Sunday heralded as "Sabbath Accidents." They do, however, occur once in a while, as appears by the following extract from the Chickopee Journal. The Westfield News Letter, it seems, printed a couple of paragraphs inculcating the doctrine, that when persons are injured or killed while riding or bathing, or engaged in any other unnecessary employment, on Sunday, it is a warning of God against Sabbath-breaking; concerning which the Journal says:—

"It had been so long since we had seen anything of this kind, that we had forgotten that they were ever common; and had we seen them in a Religious Paper, very likely we might not have noticed them particularly; but for a secular paper to make such use of an incident which chanced to fall on Sunday, is a little noticeable. We reverence the Lord's Day, and would that it were more generally used as a day of 'bodily rest and spiritual improvement.' God knows how much man needs this season, to call away his thoughts from the too engrossing subjects of business and pleasure; and so he has wisely ordained it.

"But it seems to us that the day has gone by when it is well for the public press to try to inculcate the doctrine, that a man is more likely to be drowned because he is bathing on Sunday, or to be thrown from his carriage because he is riding on Sunday. Are not God's laws unchangeable? Does the law of gravitation change, or for one moment cease its operations? Do not the crops grow by day and by night? 'Yesterday, to-day, and forever,' these laws exercise their influence on the world. It may be said, it is necessary to teach this doctrine, or the people will not be obedient, but will transgress the law which says, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.' In reply to this we would say, it is never necessary to teach an untruth to accomplish any supposed good purpose. The truth will take care of itself, and needs no backing up by questionable traditions.

"We are aware that the age is taking a too practical view of every thing, and that reverence is dying out; we are sorry for this, and should be glad if any way could be devised to change the tendency of things; but we have no faith that it can be done by trying to frighten men. On the contrary, we believe that half the present mischief has arisen from this very cause."

WESLEYAN METHODISM IN ENGLAND.—The English correspondent of the Independent says of the Annual Conference of the Methodists just closed, that the proceedings have not indicated any improvement in spiritual health. It is with the most painful regret that enlightened Christian men see that Conference is determined to maintain an unmitigated spiritual, and even material and social despotism. At one of the sittings Conference became silent and anxiously attentive, upon the announcement of a letter of resignation from Rev. G. Steward, of Glasgow, a minister who has long stood very high in the estimation of his fathers and brethren, both for his personal qualities and as an able minister of the new covenant. Mr. Steward assigns these reasons for his resignation:—

"1st. He did not think church rights were fully met—that the foundation was not broad enough, deep enough, strong enough to support. 2d. A more liberal policy was called for, with an administration suitable to the times. 3d. He believed there was no artifice, no policy in his course, from first to last, but a loyal regard to his own honest convictions.

"It was agreed that a telegraphic message be sent, entreating Mr. Steward to reconsider his determination, and allow his name to be retained upon the Minutes, that he might have time for reflection, and for conversation with his brethren. To acquiesce in this proposal he evinced no reluctance; but on this only condition—that he should be at liberty to publish his sentiments on points on which the Conference is at issue with the Reformers. Were this granted he might remain; but if not, he feared he must persist in his resignation. Gladly as the Conference would have retained so great an ornament of the body, this was a privilege that could by no means be allowed; and, therefore, Mr. Steward retires, simply and purely because, in the Wesleyan Conference, no man is at liberty to publish his opinions on the most important questions of church polity."

SABBATH-SCHOOL CELEBRATION.—The village of North Berlin, Rensselaer Co., was, on the 24th ult., the theatre of an interesting Sabbath-School (mostly Sunday-School) celebration. Eight schools were represented. The two churches were filled during the morning, where appropriate services were performed. About noon a procession was formed, consisting of six hundred and fifty children of the Sabbath-Schools, accompanied by their teachers, with appropriate banners, attended also by three bands of music. A rich dinner was served on the occasion, in a neighboring grove. A stage had been previously prepared, with seats around it for the accommodation of spectators. Here followed an examination of some of the classes, interspersed with appropriate remarks. The day was fine, and the performances passed off much to the satisfaction of all. About fifteen hundred were supposed to be present. It is hoped much good was done to the cause of Sabbath Schools. L. C. R.

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

The World's Temperance Convention was held at Metropolitan Hall last week, commencing on Third-day and closing on Sixth-day. Neal Dow, the reputed author of the Maine Law, presided, assisted by twenty-one Vice Presidents from different parts of the United States and England, among whom were Lyman Beecher and Reuben H. Walworth. At an early stage in the proceedings, the "woman's rights" question was introduced in the form of a resolution inviting "all the friends of humanity, without respect to age, sex, color, or condition," to participate in the deliberations. This question, and points of order growing out of the discussion of it, occupied a large part of the first two days, and created so much disturbance that on the second day it was found necessary to clear the Hall by the aid of police, and admit back only regularly-appointed delegates. Even after this there was a good deal of confusion, and much time was wasted in the discussion of irrelevant questions. The Convention failed to accomplish all that was intended and expected—a failure chargeable partly, no doubt, upon the pertinacity with which the "woman's rights" question was intruded upon its attention, and partly upon the activity of representatives of the rum interest in making all the confusion possible out of the various points of order which were raised. Still, a sort of temperance "platform" was framed, and steps were taken to secure a "General Convention, at least once in two years, to devise such measures as may be desirable for the general cause of prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors throughout the world." We give below what we call the "platform," and refer our readers to the daily papers for details of the proceedings.

The Committee to prepare Resolutions reported, and recommend to the Convention the adoption and publication to the world of the following resolutions and declarations, as embodying their mind, will and purpose, in relation to the great enterprise:—

1. Assembled in this Commercial Metropolis, in behalf of the interests of humanity, from various and distant portions of the world, we, the members of this Convention, would unitedly express our gratitude to HIM from whom all good comes, for the Temperance reformations of this nineteenth century; and, in a full reliance on His wisdom to guide, and His power to sustain, we would commit its future to His care, asking that we may be enabled to press it onward in a manner agreeable to His will, and with a self-denial, energy and zeal which shall speedily insure its universal triumph.

2. While the subject of Temperance is, and ever must be, first of all, a personal concern, in which each individual regards strictly the physical laws of his being, and totally ab*stains* from all that poisons and disarranges the functions of his system, it is also a public object, demanding the attention of every member of the community, that none be made a curse to themselves and those around them, by evil usages, vile tempers, and corrupt legislation.

3. The protection of the people by civil Government, from evils brought upon them by the deeds and pursuits of men, for pleasure or for gain, has in all ages and countries been acknowledged as the first of duties: and while our Legislatures and States are active and efficient in guarding against frightful casualties on railroads and steamboats, and the spread of the pestilence from city to city, it is most justly expected of them that they put their hands upon the great cause of most of these casualties, and suppress an evil which sweeps more men prematurely and wretchedly into eternity, than pestilence, famine or war.

4. The frightful work of Intemperance, the destruction, year by year, of 60,000 in Great Britain, and 30,000 in the United States, to say nothing of other countries, is traceable not so much to the natural desires and necessities of men, as to the traffic in intoxicating drinks. The supply allures to the most destructive excitements of body and mind, and all attempts to regulate it by license are utterly profitless. When most controlled, the traffic still eats like a cancer; and hence such license, whatever it may pour into the Treasury of the State, should at once be abandoned by all civilized and Christian governments.

5. The transition state in which we now behold large portions of these United States and the British Provinces, and which is attracting the attention of foreign lands, from a system of legislation which would, if possible, regulate such traffic, to one which would entirely prohibit it, is full of promise to the nations of the earth; we hail, therefore, the Maine Law as the bright and morning star of our age. We are filled with admiration and gratitude at its wisdom and results. We lift up our voices in thankfulness to Him in whose hand are the hearts of men, that so many Legislatures have adopted it, and that where it has been submitted to the people, it has received their sanction by overwhelming majorities. We welcome its early fruits as the harbinger of glorious accomplishments, when it shall be received in all States, and placed on a footing with all other acknowledged wise municipal regulations.

6. While this Convention has a full, firm and unwavering confidence in the constitutionality, the justice, the political economy and practicability of this new system of legislation, which entirely prohibits, they believe that its advance has been as rapid as is consistent with permanency; they commend it in all its bearings upon the health, the morals, the peace and financial prosperity of nations, to the careful examination of all who love their country and their race; and believing its final adoption by every State and Kingdom to be only a question of time, they urge upon their friends in every place great patience and forbearance, united to the utmost vigilance, zeal and perseverance.

7. A question of such vast magnitude, in its bearing upon the moral and physical interests of humanity, and upon every department of human industry, as the Maine Law, should never, in the opinion of this Convention, become a question of party politics; but should ever be presented as one of universal interest, to be decided by the whole people upon its true merits; and hence we repel the charge of mingling Temperance and Politics; but if any political party oppose the law, for the purpose of retaining civil power, we feel bound to consider that action at war with the best interests of the community, and to withhold from the party our votes, and in no case will we give our votes to any but those whom we know will secure and sustain the statute we demand.

8. As men, and members of the community, we owe no man anything which should cause us to favor him in a continuance in the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage: we owe no legislator or magistrate any favor who will make laws to protect such traffic, or who may refuse to support laws designed to suppress it. The one higher law, the interests of a world, call upon us, wherever we are and in whatever we are engaged, to frown upon the traffic as morally wrong, the scourge of the race, and to sustain and enforce every enactment designed for its extermination.

9. As the entire object and end of the law is in its enforcement, and as there can be no want of power in the Government that enacts to secure that end, we can view all refusal in mayors and corporations of cities, and magistrates of towns, to execute and enforce a prohibitory statute where it has been enacted, only as a wicked combination with liquor manufacturers and venders, to resist the Government, for base purposes of gain, or the attainment of civil power; and we can view such spirit only with alarm and detestation, as tending to the overthrow of all law and order and the introduction of universal anarchy.

10. An entirely prohibitory statute, embodying the spirit and principles of the Maine Law, is not the cause of a few individuals who have combined for political purposes; nor is it the cause of wealthy manufacturers and mechanics, ship-owners, who wish to thrive on the sobriety of others; but it is the cause of the people; and "if," in the language of Justin Edwards, at whose memory the Convention would drop a tear, "the people prevail, and permanently defend themselves and their children, as they have a right, and it is their duty to do, from the evil effects of the Liquor traffic, they will be benefactors, not only of the present generation, but of all future generations of men; not only in Maine, but in every State in the Union, and throughout the Christian world."

11. From the mount of hope on which we are permitted to stand, the Convention look back with sympathy upon the thousands of reclaimed men who were drawn backward by the legalized dram-shops and tippling houses in all our cities, towns and villages; they rejoice that one State after another is becoming a vast asylum, into which the reformed may enter; and they feel encouraged once more to go forth on the errand of love, and by the power of moral suasion reclaim every inebriate; believing that, as the Maine Law progresses, we shall no longer say, "There is no hope," but all shall live and be blessings to themselves and all around them.

12. With this prohibitory statute in prospect, the Convention contemplate with deepest interest the new condition of the female sex, no longer to be torn and scathed, and peeled by drunken husbands, sons and fathers; and of the rising generation, coming up without the tippling-house and dram-shop to seduce and destroy; and they ask for the powerful exertion of woman in its favor, in every way consistent with the purity and dignity of her character and sex; and that every child may be taught that it is his blessed inheritance, never to be surrendered.

13. While the Convention would express their admiration and thankfulness at the devotedness and talent of numerous public lecturers around the globe, and the spirit and ability of the Temperance Press, they would express the hope that these moral forces will be greatly increased—that eloquent tongues will be more and more ready to plead for suffering humanity—that gifted pens will be increasingly employed in the Temperance tale—that the medical and legal departments will be yet more active in exposing the poisonous character of alcoholic and drugged liquors and the iniquity of license laws—and that tracts of pungency and power may be sent forth by the million, like the leaves on the trees, for the healing of the nations. And they would recommend to those whom God has given wealth to contribute generously, that by these instrumentalities our work may be perfected.

14. To those States and Provinces which have already obtained the Maine Law in greater or less perfection, the Convention would say, Rejoice and be exceeding glad. Hold on to your high privilege; you are a spectacle to the world. Let the tide of selfishness roll over you, and the law be repealed, or, which is equally as bad, not be enforced, and you put far back the Temperance reformation, and shroud in darkness the hope of the world. To those which have not yet attained it, struggle on. The destroying angel quails before you. And when your sons shall be saved, you shall have gained the object of your toil, and your work is done, the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert will rejoice and blossom as the rose.

15. As members of the vast family of man, this Convention do deeply and tenderly sympathize with all in every nation who are suffering under the influence of intoxicating drinks; with brethren in our fatherland, where, under the bright light of the Gospel, the ravages of intemperance are most appalling; with the millions of Hindoos, resisting manfully the British license to sell the poison; with the Sandwich Islanders, driven from their Maine Law by French canon; with populous China, barring out the fatal drug, yet forced to receive it by British cupidity; and with the poor Indian, struggling for his last foothold on this continent, yet drawn to death by the vile trader; we bid all to be of good courage in their manly conflict; we appeal to all human improvements for protection from the traffic for the deluded and suffering; and we ask the blessing of Him without whom we can do nothing, that the time may soon come when the last bushel of grain shall be perverted to the drink of the drunkard, and the last miserable inebriate hurried to the grave.

The Trustees of the Pilgrim Society of Plymouth have been instructed by the Society to take measures for the erection of an appropriate MONUMENT ON PLYMOUTH ROCK, in commemoration of the Landing of the Fathers. For this purpose it is proposed to invite all, whether Societies or individuals, who feel an interest in the project, to contribute funds for its accomplishment.

European News.

The steamer Asia, with European dates to Aug. 27th, arrived at New York on the 8th inst.

There is no news of importance. The war excitement was dying out, and a period of stagnation was looked for.

Gen. Montholon, who shared the Emperor Napoleon's captivity at St. Helena, has just died at Paris. The preparations for his obsequies had been stopped "by high command," from which it is inferred that a public funeral will be given.

The Espana publishes letters from Manilla, June 12, containing accounts of the operations of Col. Mariano Oscariz, in the Sea of Jolo, against the pirates who infested its coasts. With the boats from his steamships he killed 80 of the pirates, took 200 prisoners, and liberated 33 Christians from slavery.

From Morocco, Aug. 9, it is announced that the Emperor of Morocco's forces had obtained a signal advantage over the insurgents in the interior. Two of the rebel chiefs had been captured, and were beheaded at Mequinez. The Emperor was still sick, and had sent for his eldest son, who acts as Viceroy, to return to the Capital.

California News.

Two weeks later dates from California, and two million dollars in gold dust, were received on the 9th inst.

The mines continue to render favorable accounts, and new discoveries tend to keep up the excitement.

By this arrival we have accounts of more than usual violence and crime in California.

A duel was fought near San Francisco, on the 3d of August, which resulted in the death of Lieut. Peter Smith, a son of Judge Pinckney Smith of Mississippi, aged 24 years.

A bloody affair took place at the ranch of Thomas Pyle, near San Jose, in which four persons were engaged, one of whom was killed, and another wounded.

An attempt was made to murder the Mayor of Marysville, S. M. Miles, Esq., by a person who fired a pistol at him from behind a tree, as His Honor was returning from a visit to the country.

A German, named Jacob Meincer, was murdered at Gibsonville, Sierra County, and robbed of a large amount of money. A few days after a Mexican, called "Charles the bull-fighter," was arrested at Marysville, on suspicion of being concerned in the murder, and given over to the custody of the Sheriff of Sierra. On the arrival of the prisoner at Gibsonville, he was tried by the citizens, convicted, and hung in an hour afterward. He admitted that he knew who the murderers were, and named them, but denied any participation in the crime.

Dawson, the robber of Adams & Co.'s Express, who was recently shot near Stockton, has died of his wound. Before his death he confessed to many atrocities committed last winter in the mines.

No doubt any longer exists of the identity of the principal robber killed by Capt. Love's party, with the most noted of the half dozen Joaquins. The head of Joaquin Marietta, and the mutilated hand of the cold-blooded murderer, "Three-fingered Jack," were brought to Stockton, preserved in spirits, where they have been exhibited. Another of the robbers was killed in the action, and two were taken prisoner and given up to the authorities of Mariposa.

By an Extra from the Mountain Herald, (Yreka,) we learn that several tribes of Indians in that vicinity have united and declared war upon the whites. Several of the latter have been massacred, and the inhabitants were vigorously preparing for defense. A battle was fought on the 6th of August, and several Indians killed and whites wounded.

Dates from the Sandwich Islands are to the 16th of July. A lot was sold on Britannia-st. for a Church at $1,100. The population of the Islands is supposed to be 84,165, Deaths during the past year, 4,320. Births, 1,422; or nearly three deaths to a birth. The measles and whooping cough are supposed to have taken off 10,000 in 1847 and '48, and it is thought the small pox will now take off 6,000 more. The natives are fast falling away. The fearful ravages of the small pox have created great alarm at Honolulu; 2,676 cases have been reported, and 573 deaths.

Accident on Long Island Sound.

At four o'clock on Fifth-day morning, Sept. 8, a terrible accident happened to the steamboat Bay State, of the New York and Boston Line, via Fall River, while on her way to New York. It appears that the boat was going at full speed through the water, and the passengers were soundly asleep in their berths, when a terrific crash took place, followed by a thundering explosion, and the boat was instantly enveloped in a dense cloud of steam. The greatest consternation immediately ensued among the passengers, and it was from the incautious and hasty opening of the state-room doors in the vicinity of the accident, that any ill effect to any of the passengers occurred. When the steam and smoke had cleared away sufficiently, it was ascertained that the cause of the accident was the breakage of the crank-pin, which allowed the piston to ascend with terrible force, bursting out the cylinder head with a loud explosion, and permitting the escape of steam in immense quantities. The state rooms nearest to the engine were of course filled with the scalding steam, and in these rooms were members of the family of Mr. DeWolf, of Chicago—three daughters, Marie, aged 7 years; Mary, 10; and Charlotte, 14; Mr. Warren, of Dartmouth, Mass.; Wheeler and Abbott, of Boston; Miss Havens, of Fall River; Mrs. Wheeler, of Boston; and others. Mr. DeWolf occupied a state-room farther removed from the engine, and escaped uninjured, but his attempt to save his children had a contrary effect, for, by opening the door, he removed the only barrier between them and harm. Mr. Abbott was badly scalded in his face and on his hands, and only saved his life by enveloping himself in a blanket. Mr. Warren was terribly scalded; Miss Charlotte Snow was slightly burned, and Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler were injured by the steam. The children of Mr. DeWolf died at the New York Hospital on the day of the accident.

A Maine Law State Convention is to be held at Detroit, Sept. 22.

THE INDIANA SLAVE CASE.—The Slave Case at Indianapolis, which has produced considerable excitement there, was concluded recently, by an order from the U. S. Commissioner to release John Freeman from jail, where he had been confined since the 21st of June last, as a fugitive slave. The State Sentinel says:—

"The claimant, P. Ellington, of Missouri, after an examination of the testimony adduced by Freeman's counsel, was convinced that he had claimed 'the wrong man,' and through his counsel, J. A. Liston, withdrew the claim. The testimony is clear as to Freeman's being an entirely different person from the slave 'Sam' claimed as having run away from Greenup County, Kentucky. It is also proved beyond a doubt that the latter is now in Canada. Freeman was identified by witnesses of excellent character now in Georgia and Alabama, as being a free colored man, who lived in Georgia until 1844. A civil suit will be instituted by Freeman against Pleasant Ellington for false imprisonment, and process issued accordingly. The damages claimed are $10,000. The case will come up for trial at the next term of the Circuit Court, the fourth Monday in October."

A MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.—A circular has been issued, inviting the principal supporters of Protestant missions to a Conference in London, to be held during the first week in October. The following are among the objects sought:—

"1. The promotion of a missionary spirit in the heart.

"2. The encouragement of mutual interest in, and prayer for, the plans of all engaged in the missionary cause.

"3. The manifestation of the real unity which exists between all evangelical Protestant churches.

"4. An interchange of sentiments for the promotion of the most effectual methods of conducting the missionary work.

"5. The circulation of authentic intelligence, comprising the entire efforts made by Protestants for the evangelization of the world."

SUMMARY.

Since the opening of Washington's Headquarters at Newburgh to the public, in July, 1850, about 30,000 names have been entered upon the Visitors' Register. A glance over the pages of this ledger affords a curious study of chirography. A man's characteristics are shown generally by the manner in which he signs his name. A tolerably correct idea can be formed of the throng of visitors to the place from the daily inspection of the Headquarters' ledger. Every State in the Union, and almost every civilized country on the globe, is represented by the names of her citizens on its pages. Many visit Newburg solely for a sight of the old buildings.

James Willis, or Wakely, said to be a notorious gambler, recently attempted to commit suicide by shooting himself in the right side of the head, while in the pistol gallery, basement of the St. Charles saloon, corner of Broadway and Leonard-st., N. Y. It appears that Willis entered the pistol gallery and asked the privilege of shooting at the target, which was granted. A second charge was put in the pistol, and after a short delay, Willis, instead of shooting at the target, shot himself in the head, inflicting a dangerous and perhaps a fatal wound.

Archbishop Whatelly, of Dublin, says that however much people may laugh at him for avowing it, he is a living monument of mesmerism. Having suffered severely for many years from rheumatism, when the doctors had done their best or worst, as the case might be, he was advised to have recourse to mesmerism as a last resoucre. In the course of one week he was perfectly cured, and has never since experienced any severe return of the complaint.

The Czar of Russia has, through his private secretary, ordered eight blocks of the Vermont marble, weighing six tons each. They are designed for the erection of a monument to Kieffiieur, who is supposed to have been the originator of the movement for firing Moscow on the advance of the French army.

The earnings of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad for August are: Freight $9,472 30. Passengers $8,782 40. Total $18,254 70. The increase over the receipts of July, is $2,069 85, and over those of August, 1852, $12,736 48.

Letters have been received at Boston, stating that the captain and crew of the brig Rodolph were massacred by the natives of one of the King's Mill Group, in December, 1851, and the vessel destroyed by fire. The Rodolph was owned by Capt. Alfred R. Fisher, now at San Francisco.

A dispatch dated New Orleans, September 4, 1853, says: The total number of deaths reported during the last week was 955, of which 814 were from Yellow Fever. This shows a decrease of over 600 from the returns of the previous week.

The Milwaukie Sentinel states that the Traveller arrived at that port from Chicago on Wednesday, with seven hundred and thirty-four passengers, five hundred and six of which were German and Norwegian emigrants, on their way to settle in the interior of the State of Wisconsin.

Rev. James Lowry, of Chester district, S. C., recently deceased, left one thousand dollars to the General Assembly's Board of Foreign Missions, and one thousand to the Board of Domestic Missions.

The Indianapolis Sentinel chronicles the death from delirium tremens of Joshua Soule, Jr., a son of Bishop Soule, of the Methodist Church. He had long been a confirmed drunkard.

A Custom-House broker recently absconded from New York with $40,000, the property of an importing house, from whom he received that sum for the payment of duties which he never paid.

A new banking institution, under the name of the "Oneida Central Bank," is about to be organized in the village of Rome, with a capital of $150,000 or over.

The houses of the Catharine-st Ferry between New York and Brooklyn were destroyed by fire on the 5th inst. Loss $15,000.

A fire at Augusta, Me., Sept. 3d, destroyed six sawmills, a machine shop, sash and blind factory, &c. Damage estimated at over $100,000.

An instance has recently occurred in Cincinnati, in which a lady was a maid, a wife, and a widow, all in one day. Mrs. Connell, wife of the man who was so cruelly murdered on Front-street, had married her husband on the morning of the same day on which the fatal affray occurred. At morn a maid, at noon a wife, at evening a widow.

We continue to receive advices of a rapid decline of the fever at New Orleans. Friday last was observed almost unanimously as a day of prayer. The day was rainy.

The Coroners' Jury on the dead by the accident on the Bay State consider that the occurrence was in all respects fortuitous, and of course no one is to be blamed.

The contributions to the Washington Monument during the month of August amounted to $3,518.

MARRIED.

In Clarksville, Madison Co., N. Y., on the 5th inst., by Eld. J. Clark, Mr. ROBERT W. BROWN, of Brookfield, to Miss ANN L. NEWTON, of the former place.

In DeRuyter, N. Y., on the 3d inst., by Eld. R. G. Burdick, Mr. ROSWELL A. CRANDALL, of Lincklaen, to Miss JULIETTE CRANDALL, of DeRuyter.

At Hebron, Potter Co., Pa., Aug. 29th, by Eld H. W. Babcock, Mr. SIMEON B. LUCE to Miss SARAH M. BROCK, both of Hebron.

DIED.

At Oswayo, Potter Co., Pa., Aug. 17th, of heart disease, Mrs. POLLY WELLS, wife of John Wells, in the 55th year of her age. In youth she professed religion, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin. Subsequent to marriage, she removed to Alfred. During a residence of twelve years at that place, she was active in Christian duty. From Alfred she removed to Oswayo, where she has resided during the last twenty-one years. She united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hebron soon after it was constituted, of which she remained an efficient member until her decease. Her last illness, which was protracted and severe, was borne with fortitude, patience and resignation. She manifested a deep interest in the religious welfare of her husband and children, who will doubtless long remember her faithful admonitions. It is believed that to her death is gain. H. W. B.

In Adams, N. Y., July 17th, 1853, of consumption, sister MARY ANN JONES, wife of Bro. Lorenzo Jones, and daughter of Dea. Roswell Saunders, in the 21st year of her age. Sister Jones united with the Church in Adams about three years since, and from that time until her death lived not only as one that was born of God, but as one that was fast ripening for an inheritance among the sanctified. Her last sickness was protracted, but easy, and as she approached the gate of death, her regard for earthly things and friends seemed to be lost in the love of heavenly things and the society of the redeemed. Her last words to her husband and friends were, "You will try to meet me in heaven?" She has gone in the early bloom of life, whilst the tenderest ties of affection are sundered; but we mourn not as those who have no hope. J. S.

In Milton, Wis, Sept. 1, 1853, WILLIAM B. GREENMAN, second son of Henry G. and Mary B. Greenman, in the 20th year of his age. Bro. Greenman embraced religion when about ten years old, under the pastoral labors of Eld James H. Cochran, deceased, and united with the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., where he remained a worthy member until he departed this life to join the church triumphant. He had just obtained a letter of his standing at Alfred, with the design of uniting at Milton, where he has been living for two years past. Bro. G. will be very much missed, especially among the young people. He was beloved and respected by all who knew him. His last rational expressions of hope were very strong. In the latter part of his sickness, he suffered much from mental derangement, his disease being congestion of the brain. V. H.

At the residence of his son, William C. Tanner, in Groton, Ct., July 13th, Mr. JOHN TANNER, aged 70 years. His disease was consumption of the lungs, the last stages of which were distressing in the extreme, which he bore with Christian patience and fortitude, never being heard to murmur or repine at his lot; but, on the contrary, he calmly awaited his appointed time, till his change came. Brother Tanner was, for many years a worthy member of the second Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I., and has left good evidence that he has exchanged his standing for a membership in the church triumphant.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells, for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

Miscellaneous.

Mischief-Makers.

Oh! could there in this world be found
Some little spot of happy ground,
Without the village tattling!
How doubly blest that spot would be
Where all might dwell in liberty,
Free from the bitter misery,
Of gossips' endless prattling!

If such a spot were really known,
Dame Peace might call it as her own,
And in it she might fix her throne,
Forever and forever;
There like a queen might reign and live,
While every one would soon forgive
The little slights they might receive,
And be offended never.

'Tis mischief-makers that remove
Far from our hearts the warmth of love,
And lead us all to disapprove
What is another pleasure;
They seem to take one's part—but when
They've heard our cares, unkindly then
They soon retail them o'er again,
Mixed up with poisonous measure.

And then they've such a cunning way
Of telling ill-meant tales; they say,
"Don't mention it, I pray,
I would not tell another;"
Straight to your neighbor then they go,
Narrating every thing they know;
And break the peace of high and low,
Wife, husband, friends and brother.

Oh! that the mischief-making crew
Were all reduced to one or two,
And they were painted red or blue,
That every one might know them;
Then would our villagers forget
To rage and quarrel, fume and fret,
And fall into an angry pet,
With things so much below them.

For 'tis a sad, degrading part,
To make another's bosom smart,
And plant a dagger in the heart
We ought to love and cherish!
Then let us evermore be found
In quietness with all around,
While friendship, joy and peace abound,
And angry feelings perish.

An Imperial Fete Champetre.

A correspondent of the New York Observer gives the following account of a visit to the country by Louis Napoleon and the members of his family and court.

"The ladies, yesterday, came in from a walk, in a great flurry, to announce the fact that the Emperor and the Empress were to dine at Murette—a hunting box, or small house for the use of the Emperor when he hunts in the forest, about eight miles from any place which indicates civilization, if a forest well taken care of, 12 miles from Paris, may remind one of the absence of human society. The only spare carriage to be found in St. Germain was soon put into requisition, and away we started for the center of the forest. At first I was disposed to be philosophical. I had been pondering all the morning on one of the ancient controversies of St. Augustine, and did not particularly enjoy an interruption to my studies. Besides, I had seen the Emperor a dozen times, at a distance, and thought it rather a small affair to ride eight miles to see him jump out of his carriage. But the ladies would go, and, as the day was fine, and a drive between arching trees, over a splendid road, in the middle of summer, is not a great calamity, I submitted, as a married man is bound to do, to female authority. I must say, that nothing is prettier than a drive through a French forest in a warm day. The roads are all paved or macadamized, the ancient elms and oaks completely overhang them, thus presenting long vistas of arched green with the distant horizon shining like the moon, the underwood is completely cleared, and a great variety of flowers and plants grow in great luxuriance on every side, while no troublesome insects disturb the placidity of the mind, or interrupt the feelings of enjoyment. In good time we arrived at Murette, expecting to find a crowd impelled by the same folly as ourselves. But fortunately the people had dispersed upon the different routes by which the Emperor was expected, no one knowing the way which the Emperor would come. He never tells his movements until the last hour, as he lives in perpetual danger of assassination—a very probable fate to a man who has overturned all constitutional liberty, and mocked the ideas of the civilized world. As he is, however, a prudent, sagacious and able ruler, no event would be more sincerely deplored than his removal from the place he has usurped, although the usurpation has been sanctioned by the votes of the nation. It is not likely he will be continued long, notwithstanding all his precautions, and all his excellence as a sovereign, if we may call a great power wisely administered by a bad man an excellence.

"After we had walked about the woods for a while, and had surveyed the preparations of the numerous servants to receive his majesty, the imperial cortege came in sight. We stationed ourselves against the trees by the side of the narrow forest road, and had a most admirable view of the Emperor and Empress. He was, as he is ever represented, calm and cold, with inexpressive features, and unimposing address, giving no outward indication of what he proves himself to be, the master spirit of France at this time. She was all grace and smiles and beauty, such as Burke fancied in Marie Antoinette when dauphiness of France. The pictures of her, even the best, all represent her with an anxious frown; but I saw it not yesterday, as she bowed to the people assembled to welcome her in the depth of the forest. When the imperial couple and all the suite had alighted—Marshals, Ministers of State, Princes, Senators, and ladies of rank, among whom was also the Queen of Spain, now on a visit to the Emperor, we had a still better opportunity to survey the group, as they promenaded before the house within 50 feet of us. The ladies were all dressed with great elegance, yet simply, in muslins without ornaments, and the gentlemen were in frock coats, and without any marks of rank. Indeed, no one would have supposed they were other than ordinary men, either in dignity, dress, physiognomy or manner. The Emperor is a small man in stature, and wore a blue frock coat and grey pants, without any decoration, except the ribbon in his button hole, which all distinguished French gentlemen, and even many undistinguished, constantly wear. He walked about and surveyed the horses as if he knew more about them than the politics of Europe. He walked in a half shuffling, half mincing gait, like a decayed roue. He stooped considerably, and looked upon the ground, with the air of a student rather than a military man. Indeed, he looked like a dissipated, contemplative, selfish, scornful man, whose life alternated between intellectual labor and sensual pleasure. There was nothing imposing, impressive, or dignified in his manner. He wore a pair of white kid gloves, and swung a walking-stick like one who promenades Broadway on a hot day. His numerous attendants seemed to be quite at their ease in his presence, and swaggered about him with their hats on, like a company of English aristocrats on the race-ground, but he had but little to say to any of them. After the ladies had taken on their light bonnets, which now hung back of the head, exposing the face very boldly, according to my ideas, they joined the gentlemen on the grass plat before the house. Then they went in to dinner, and the dining-room occupied three-fourths of the whole house. A band of musicians was stationed under the windows and played during dinner, and played most beautifully and noisily, but softly. As the doors and windows were open, we could see the tables, and the people at dinner. The servants, who waited at the table, were in simple black with white cravats, like English clergymen, whom, in aspect as well as dress, they strikingly resembled. The servants who were in livery were footmen, and of an inferior grade. The dinner occupied about an hour, and brought into requisition an infinite number of plates, which were of Sevres china. The forks and spoons were silver gilt. The dishes were both porcelain and silver. They did not drink much wine, or eat much of the dessert, which was nearly all sent out as it was brought in. I observed that melons were eaten immediately after the fish. When all had dined, as at our ordinary tables d'hote, they came out in front of the house again—ladies and gentlemen. The gentlemen did not remain to sip wine, as in England, after the ladies had retired. Coffee was then handed around in the open air, which all took standing. Most of the gentlemen smoked cigarettes. I observed that the Empress herself smoked one with the air of a lady accustomed to that soothing pleasure. They all smoked incessantly. They then played at foot-ball before the house, and between us spectators. The ladies entered into the amusement with great ardor, and the Empress tore her dress as it became entangled in her satin boot. Those who were not expert at kicking, struck the ball with their fists, and none showed so much skill as the Emperor. They laughed and talked and romped, with cigarettes in their mouths, in a queer way, which would have equally scandalized Queen Victoria or the prim maidens of a New England village. There was nothing but fun and frolic, and a most marked equality in the enjoyment. When they were wearied, or rather, when the servants had had time to remove the tables and sweep the floor, which had no carpet, they reëntered the dining-room, the Emperor leading the way. Then took place several dances—quadrilles, waltzes, &c., and the people drew still nearer the house, almost under the windows. We saw all the movements perfectly. The ladies said that the Emperor danced the best, and the Empress the next best. There was great animation, quite different, I am told, from an English ball room, where they dance as coldly and lifelessly as the ladies of Beacon-street are accustomed to bow to their acquaintances. English dignity would introduce formality and stupidity even into the dance. But the French have less disdain of natural expressions of pleasure, and if more artificial in ordinary life, are at least more graceful and pleasing when they meet together. Think of an English monarch or nobleman dining in a frock coat or dancing with a cigarette in his mouth, or at least, suspending the act of smoking only in the dance itself. Now all these things I saw with my own eyes, and I write without any exaggeration, and have omitted many other things which I might have mentioned, among which is the selection of a uniform for the huntsmen of the forest by the Emperor. It was amusing to see a poor fellow brought up all trembling with embarrassment before royalty, and examined from head to foot by imperial eyes, while the tailor stood by to take directions, and while the great officers of State passed their judgment on the contemplated changes."

From the Philadelphia Ledger.

"We'll not Quarrel about a Trifle."

We never hear men, on making a bargain, use this common phrase, without being sure that trouble is in the wind. Every contract, even one for the value of a dollar, should be explicitly stated, down to its minutes particulars, so that there can be no possibility of misconstruction. If this is neglected, difficulty is nearly certain to arise. Many an honest man has been cheated, many a friendship has been broken for life, because a bargain has not been fully stated, because the parties "would not quarrel about trifles."

Two acquaintances, for example, who have long lived in pleasant social intercourse, come at last to have a business transaction together. One may sell the other a horse, a carriage, or a house. Or, they may make a barter in the way of regular trade. Too often, especially if young men, they will come to a general understanding, but omit to explain themselves sufficiently as to the details. When the contract is executed, they find, for the first time, that they have misapprehended each other. One has expected certain minor concessions, which the other has not even imagined he would be called on to make. If the friends are wise, they perceive their mistake, and retrace their steps by having a full explanation. A compromise follows, and all goes well.

But too often they are not wise. Too often, instead of coming amicably together, they charge each other with a design to cheat. "I never before knew Mr. A. wasn't a man of his word," says one. "What a knave Mr. B. is, after all!" says the other, "wants to over-reach me because I did'nt have an agreement written down." Or, perhaps it is, "I always thought Mr. C. a man of honor, but if I ever deal with him again, I'll have every thing in black and white." And so they go on, until finally a law-suit is the consequence; probably each party has costs to pay that often exceed the original amount in dispute; and an alienation for life results. Every day one sees such controversies arising. Perhaps it is a house that is sold. The buyer says to the seller, "Well, if I purchase, I suppose you'll let half the price lie on mortgage, as I please." "Oh! there'll be no difficulty about that," replies the other, "I'm in no hurry for the money." On this the deeds are drawn. Several years pass; money becomes scarce; the seller really has need for his mortgage money. But, on asking for it, he is told by the buyer that the mortgage was to lie. "What! not forever?" replies the other. Practically, the purchaser considers it so, however, and never forgives his friend, if, compelled by circumstances, he sells the house to get his money. Instances like this are of almost daily occurrence. Similar ones, in reference to other transactions, are even more frequent.

Where one party to a bargain is honest, while the other is the reverse, it is still more dangerous not to have the contract fully and explicitly stated. There are always men ready to take advantage of any uncertainties in bargains to which they may be parties. If they wish to put off pay-day, or to save interest, or to draw back from their agreement, they have, in such cases, a pretence for a misunderstanding, and this is all they need in order to carry out their views. They pretend that their bargain was different from what the other party asserts; there is no written agreement, nor any witnesses; and, consequently, as one man's word is as good as another's, the innocent party is victimized; all too because he was fool enough to believe that other people "would not quarrel about trifles."

On no account, therefore, should a bargain be left vague, even in the smallest particular. The best plan is to have the contract written out, if the matter is an imporant one; the next best is to have an intelligent witness or two; but the very worst is to trust to friendship, honor, or other nonsense of that kind, because experience teaches they are often no safeguards at all. Be sure that he is either a knave, a fool, or a greenhorn, who, in making a bargain, winds up with, "But we'll not quarrel about trifles."

A Dialogue.

"Isaac, have you paid the printer?" inquired an old lady of her husband, who was delighting the family circle by reading to them a fine looking newspaper—[excuse our blushes, for editors are as modest as maidens.]

"No, Rebecca, I have not," answered the old gentleman, adjusting his spectacles—"but you know it is only a trifle. The printers, I see, give a very polite dun, but they cannot mean me, as I am one of their particular friends, and at all events my two dollars would be but a trifling sum to them."

"Well, Isaac, if all their subscribers were to say the same thing, the printers would starve, unless they could conjure their types into corn, and their press into a flour mill. And surely you, as their 'friend,' should be more punctual in paying them, than if you were their professed enemy; besides, it would show your attachment to them, and the good cause which they advocate."

"I thought of settling my subscription when I was in town last," said Isaac, wincing from the rub, "but the money that I received for my produce was better than usual, and I disliked to part with it."

"Why, certainly, you would not pay them in bad money, Isaac?"

"No, my dear, but sometimes I am obliged to take uncurrent paper, and I prefer paying my debts with that, when I can get it off—oh! these banks! Any way, that sort would suit the printers just as well, as they don't keep it long. My neighbor Jenkins said he passed off a bill on them, which nobody else would take, and they did'nt refuse it."

"Why, Isaac, I'm ashamed of you!" exclaimed the good old lady—"you would not, I hope, imitate the example of that miserable fellow Jenkins? Why, he would jew the doctor out of half his bill, and pay the balance in trade."

"Yet he paid the printers, grandma," interrupted a little flaxen-haired girl who stood beside her grandfather's knee.

"Well, well, I'll call and pay them," said the old gentleman, not a little nettled—"for an article that I read in their paper the other day was worth twice the amount of the subscription."

"And you know, grandpa, you said that the piece about the countefeiters saved you twenty dollars, which you would have taken from the Yankee pedlar," again interrupted the little girl.

"Yes, it did so, Mary, and for that, when I go to town, I'll pay off my old score, and next year in advance into the bargain."

Mr. Isaac —— kept his word like an honest man. And whether his conscience smote him about the uncurrent money, or because he was convinced of the excellence of the arguments of his wife and rosy-cheeked grandchild, we cannot say; be that as it may, he has never since been in debt for his subscription. Now, we feel assured, that if the good ladies in the town and country, and "throughout all creation," as that most veritable nondescript Major Jack Downing would say, only knew how the hand and heart of the printer is gladdened by the welcome salutation of such a man as Isaac, they would read this dialogue to their husbands, and urge them to "do likewise."

A Chinese Army.

The New York Courier des Etats Unis publishes a letter from a Catholic missionary in China, giving the following description of the composition of a Chinese army:—

"A Chinese army is the most curious thing in the world; I have twice enjoyed the sight of one, and I confess that if ever in my life I regretted not being a painter, it was on those occasions. The most faithful descriptions cannot give an idea of such soldiers. The first year of my entrance into China, the Mussulmen of Yunnan, an active and numerous population, rebelled in mass against the authority of the Mandarins. To bring them back to order, the Governor, Commander-in-Chief, made haste to call to his aid the militia of our province, which was under his jurisdiction. I met a large body of auxiliaries with the General-in-Chief. The latter was in a very elegant litter, borne by eightmen. His troops marched in the greatest disorder, like a band of robbers. They were armed with lances and had guns; each soldier carried, besides, his umbrella and his lantern, which gave the expedition an indescribable appearance; it was sufficiently grotesque to have excited the inextinguishable laughter of Homer. This army, without discipline and without experience, would be destroyed by a single one of your battalions without the latter receiving a scratch. A European soldier would fire twenty cartridges before the Chinese would get off one. This is not all. When the guns are used, he who holds the musket turns away his head while another touches it off. You can imagine the exactness of this shot, and the celerity of the manœuvre, especially when it is rainy weather."

"To send off a few soldiers," adds M. La Place, Apostolic Vicar of Kiang Sio, "it is incredible how much trouble is given to families; for it must not be supposed that the Chinese foot soldier walks; no, he must have a car. The cavalier, in his turn, would become too much fatigued if he went on horseback; he, also, must have a car. Finally, the war-horse himself does not know how to carry his own saddle; for his harness, cars are needed. So far is this carried, that the last week, in the city of Choni-Tcheon Fou, two leagues from here, in getting off three hundred soldiers, there were 1000 men for escort."

Author of the Railway System.

Thomas Gray, the first projector of a general railway system, was generally laughed at as the suggester of a useless project, met no encouragement, became poor, disheartened, despised, and neglected. Yet, despised and neglected as he was, the work which he suggested advanced with rapid strides, and still moves onward with increased and still increasing velocity. We find the following brief sketch of Mr. Gray in one of our exchanges, though we know not who is entitled to credit for it. No one will read it without feeling an interest in the subject, and a desire for further information of this gentleman:—

"Thomas Gray was born in Leeds, England, about half a century, or more, ago—and this is all we know of his early history. The Middletown colliery had a railway to carry coals to Leeds, a distance of three miles. The cars moved along at the rate of three and a half miles per hour. It was laughed at—not by Gray, but by the wise public. Gray saw in this little work something that might be augmented into greatness; and he thought upon the subject—and forthwith became a visionary! He talked and wrote upon his project of 'A General Iron Railway;' the people declared him insane. He petitioned Parliament, sought interviews with the lords and other great men, and thus became the laughing stock of all England. He received nothing but rebuffs, wherever he went. All this took place in 1820, or thereabouts. But he succeded at last. The railways were laid. The world was benefited by the madness of Thomas Gray.

"Well, what became of him? the reader will ask. We do not know; but we believe he still lives in Exeter, to which place he removed. Up to 1846 he had been neglected. While thousands have been enriched by the consummation of his brilliant scheme, he remained forgotten—forced by poverty to sell glass on a commission for a living. Howitt, in the People's Journal, a few years ago, gave a somewhat lengthy sketch of his career, thus bringing him into public notice. We have seen nothing in print in relation to him lately."

Hints on Thinning Fruit.

The prospects of an abundant fruit crop throughout most of the fruit growing regions of this country have scarcely ever been better, according to the best information we can obtain, than they are at the present season. Everything looks promising. Last season the crop was very light generally—in many localities a total failure; and this will contribute much to the abundance of this season's crop.

Now we wish to offer a few hints in regard to certain precautions, which the circumstances call for; that is, provided the crop will be as heavy as we have reason to anticipate. It is very well known that in favorable seasons, after a failure especially, trees bear too much. It is very common to see them so loaded with fruit as not only to cease growing entirely, but to bend and break down under its weight. This should be guarded against. Trees are, in a multitude of cases, enfeebled, broken, contract diseases, and are, in short, ruined by excessive bearing; and every man who appreciates the value of a full-grown, bearing fruit tree, worth from $100 to $500, as the case may be, should guard against such a result as carefully as he would his ox or his horse against excessive labor that would be certain to injure or kill him

Trees, like animals, have constitutions that can, by proper treatment, be kept sound for a great length of time, or by neglect, or bad treatment, broken down. Our opinion is that the feeble, diseased, and short-lived condition of the peach tree in New Jersey is due, in a great measure, to a greedy or careless system of over-cropping. We know how races of men and horses degenerate, from hard labor and bad treatment—how they dwindle down in size, lose their proportion, symmetry and intelligence, in short, wear out, to use a very common but expressive term. Trees "wear out," too. How many we have all seen that in their youth, even before they had arrived at a full bearing age and size, began to look old—the branches twisted and knarly, the bark rough and mossy, and all covered with small, feeble, ill-formed buds and fruit spurs, loaded, perhaps, with small, worthless fruit, not worth picking up.

Now those who desire to guard their trees against wearing out, must not be too greedy of a great crop. They must master that natural reluctance we all feel to pick off a portion of the fruit. They must thin them out so as to leave them evenly distributed over the tree, and only so many as can be brought to full and perfect maturity, without injury or death to the tree. But we shall be asked, "How are we too know how many we ought to leave, or how many to take?" Well, we confess it takes some little skill and experience to thin a crop judiciously, but he who goes about it in earnest will find some indications to aid him. It will not do to thin in all cases alike, because the vigorous tree, in a generous soil, will carry a large crop without injury, and one that would be almost certain death to a delicate or feeble tree, having limited resources in the way of food; just as a healthy, robust, well-fed man, can perform a day's work with ease, that a weakly, ill-fed man, dare not attempt. The growth of a tree, the appearance of its foliage, the length and thickness of its young shoots, afford a very reliable guide as to the vigor of a tree and its ability to bear a heavy crop. Some varieties are naturally moderate and constant bearers, and if kept under good culture, might never require thinning, while others bear enormously some years, the fruit actually covering every part of the tree, and requiring props and supports to keep it from being torn to pieces. Such trees cannot bear so in successive years, nor can they long remain healthy. Then, beside thinning the fruit, good culture must be given them in their fruitful years, and top-dressings of compost in a well-decayed state. Garden trees may have liquid manure and mulching instead of top-dressing. Such care as this, not costing much, will not only sustain the vigor and health of trees, but produce large, handsome, marketable fruits. When a tree is loaded to breaking-down, one-half or three-fourths of the fruit is worthless, and all the advantage of a large crop is lost.

We consider this subject of much importance to the fruit grower. We know by ample experience that it is. We crop our own trees heavily, perhaps too heavily; but every season we perform a thinning process, and we should consider the neglect of it nothing less than the willful destruction of our trees.

SUBSTITUTE FOR GUTTA PERCHA.—Dr. Riddell of India, in making experiments on the Muddar plant of India (Asclepia gigantea) found that its milky juice when dried became tough and hard like Gutta Percha, and precisely analogous to it. It is charred by sulphuric acid, converted into a yellow resinous substance by nitric acid, and but little or not at all acted on by muriatic or ascertic acid or alcohol. Spirits of turpentine dissolve it into a viscid glue, which, when taken between the thumb and finger, pressed together, and then separated, shows numberless minute threads, all which results exactly correspond with those of Gutta Percha. In hot water it becomes plastic and has been moulded into cups and vessels. It will also unite with the true Gutta Percha. The Muddar also produces an excellent fibre useful in the place of hemp and flax. An acre of land cultivated with it would produce a large quantity of both fibre and juice. The poorest land suffices for its growth. A nearly similar substance is procurable from the juice of the Euphorbia Tirucalli, only when it hardens after boiling it becomes brittle. The subject is most important, as the demand for Gutta Percha is so certain quickly to exceed the supply of it that can be procured.

HOW TO DRY PEACHES.—Do our readers know how to dry peaches? Take those of the best quality, just as they are ripe enough to eat, halve them, remove the stones, and sprinkle over them, in the hollow from which the pit was taken, a little nice sugar; dry them in a brick oven, after the bread, &c., is withdrawn.

They are far better than if dried in the sun, retaining their aroma and flavor, and besides are totally free from insects. Prepared in this way, from peaches fully ripe, they need no cooking, but are simply soaked in cold water. All the sugar they require (ranging of course with the variety) is added while drying. Peaches thus dried and prepared are only inferior to the fresh fruit, of which they retain the flavor in a remarkable degree. If you prefer, take them not quite so ripe, and peel the fruit, but the flavor is not so good as when fully ripe, and is dissipated more in the process of drying.

ENTHUSIASTIC.—Professor Agassiz could not attend the Convention lately held at Cleveland, on account of sickness caused by his researches in the rice swamps of the South. The Cleveland Herald says:—"His search for things new and strange at the South was crowned with complete success; but he contracted the malignant fever of the country, from which he barely escaped with life. Among other novelties which he found there, was a fish without ventral fins, and it is related as expressive of his unextinguishable enthusiasm in matters of science, that when slowly recovering, a friend called to see him, and said to him, 'I am sorry to hear, Professor, that you have been dangerously ill.' 'Ah! yes,' said Professor A., 'I have been very sick, but no matter, I have found a fish without ventrals'!"

THE FINGER OF GALILEO.—After all, I know not whether the most interesting sight in Florence is not a little mysterous bit of something like parchment, which is shown you under a glass case in the prinicpal public library. It stands pointing towards heaven, and is one of the fingers of Galileo. The hand to which it belonged is supposed to have been put to the torture by the Inquisition for ascribing motion to the earth; and the finger is now worshiped for having proved the motion. After this let no suffering reformer's pen misgive him. If his cause be good, justice will be done to it at last. [Leigh Hunt.

VARIETY.

The Scientific American says that Teeth, in the form of purified white India rubber, have been patented in England. It adds:—The adhesion is complete; it can be moulded with perfection to suit every inequality of the gums and teeth, and supplies an artificial periosteum, as it were, to the teeth, when they become painful by the wasting away of the gum. Added to these is the elasticity of the material, which completely obviates the inconveniences that arise from any motion with artificial teeth made by other means.

A letter from Lahaina, Sandwich Islands, gives a table of the weather for 1844 and 1845, and says:—"At a single glance, it will be seen that in the winter, the thermometer stands no lower than 72, and in the summer season, no higher than 83 or 84. During the winter, and at a height not exceeding one thousand feet above the sea, a person's thoughts dwell not seriously on the necessity of fire; and during the summer, as far down as the lowest plains, there is usually a fine sea or land breeze, which is decidedly agreeable."

No man is a gentleman, who, without provocation, would treat with incivility the humblest of his species. It is a vulgarity for which no accomplishment or dress can ever atone. Show me the man who desires to make every one happy around him, and whose greater solicitude is never to give just cause of offense to any one, and I will show you a gentleman by nature and practice, although he may never have worn a suit of broadcloth, nor ever heard of a lexicon.

As a proof of the valuable services rendered by swallows, it is estimated that one of these birds will destroy, at a low calculation, 900 insects per day; and, when it is considered that some insects produce as many as nine generations in a summer, the state of the air but for these birds may be readily conceived. One kind of insect alone might produce 560,770,488,000,000,000 of its race in a single year.

Cyrus, the first Emperor of Persia, obtained a victory over the Assyrians, and after the battle, was so sensibly touched with seeing the field covered with dead bodies, that he ordered the same care to be taken of the wounded Assyrians as his own soldiers, saying: "They are men as we, and are no longer our enemies when once they are vanquished."

The Chinese think that the inventor of ink was one of the greatest men that ever lived; that he enjoys a blessed immortality, and is charged with keeping an account of the manner in which all ink is used here below, and for every abuse of it he records a black mark against the offender.

During the last fifty years, France, with a population of more than thirty-five millions, has increased in the number of her people but little more than the two States of New York and Pennsylvania, with not more than one-sixth her population.

THE BIBLE IN OUR COMMON SCHOOLS.

Number Eight.

BY C. ROLLIN BURDICK, A. B.

Our country is unparalleled in extent and resources. The American Eagle laves his plumes in the great lakes of the North, and in the briny wave of Mexico's gulf; he listens to the wave-dashes of the Atlantic, and hears the thunder-surges of the far-stretching Pacific. He traces with distance-piercing vision the meanderings of a thousand magnificent rivers, hears the roar of their stupendous cataracts, and gazes down upon the glowing waters of unnumbered lakes. He listens to the music of the jenny and loom of industrious New England, hears the careless whistle of the happy plough-boy of the West, and catches the click of the far-off Californian's spade, while he is digging in the mines for gold. The smoke of numerous furnaces goes up to him, bearing on its curling columns a sweet-smelling savor; and the noise and bustle of a hundred cities is borne up to his ears. Truly is America a favored land. Foreign wealth is pouring into her ports by the million; her soil of inexhaustible fertility places her beyond the fear of famine; her rich mines of gold, lead and iron, furnish her with almost boundless resources for manufacturing needful utensils, and means of defense; and her navigable rivers and lakes furnish her with unparalleled natural facilities for intercommunication.

With all these vast facilities for obtaining wealth, it is no wonder that the Anglo-Saxon bosom should glow with a desire to stretch forth the hand and pluck the golden fruit. This desire has given an impetus to speculation and invention, hitherto unparalleled. Guided by the spirit of the age, it has felled mighty forests, dug long canals, tunneled mountains, bridged rivers and broad ravines, and interwoven our wide country with a stupendous lattice work of iron rails. It sends the iron horse, tramping and snorting, drawing his mighty loads after him, through almost every nook and corner of our land, and starts off upon her long journeys the magnificent steamship, ploughing her way through the foaming billows, from land to land, and from nation to nation, over the whole earth. Wealth drives the plough, wields the spade, plies the spindle and shuttle, squares the stone and timber, and rears the stately edifice. The mechanic, toiling from day to day, from month to month, and from year to year; the merchant at his desk, the lawyer pleading for his client, the physician in his daily and nightly rounds, and in too many instances the minister of the gospel declaiming to his people, are after wealth. "More wealth," cries the greedy miser, as with one hand he grips fast his hoarded gold, and with the other reaches forth to seize other ill-got spoils. "Gain, gain, GAIN," cries the speculator, as he encompasses in his unholy clutches God's free earth, and withholds it from His poor. Gold guides the tactics of the warrior and the politician, as well as the highwayman and pirate. Gold prompts the overseer to exact the last moment of working time from his operatives, and wields the whip of the slave-driver upon the Southern plantation.

Gold is almost omnipotent in its influence over men. Avarice is becoming the ruling spirit of our age—the prime mover of the machinery of society; and there is danger that, in this universal push for wealth, this running up and down over the whole earth for gold, it will gain the precedence of all other and better principles, and set up its iron reign in the hearts of men. This is the unmistakable tendency of the age in America. It has already overstepped the barriers of national justice, and stripped from a weaker sister Republic a large and valuable portion of her territory, after carrying desolation and woe to the hearts of thousands of widows and orphans, by the murder of their husbands and fathers, and the demolition of their hearthstones and altars. The national avarice, only fed and strengthened by this act of injustice, grows more and more rampant for fresh spoils, and is now cooking up new schemes for gratifying its appetite. Cuba must be ours, for her wealth, her rich soil, and her slaves. It seems to be the determination of certain intriguing politicians to wrest this slavery-cursed island from the hands of Spain, in order more effectually to entail the curse upon future generations, and to strengthen its hands in this FREE (!) Republic. Uncle Sam and Santa Anna are shaking their fists at each other across the Rio Grande, as if there were something wrong. Perhaps Santa Anna has accused Uncle Sam of growing covetous in his prosperity—(most outrageous slander!)—and Uncle Sam, having given him the lie, is going to lick him, and make him pay the expense in the bargain, as he did in '48. The number of troops now stationed at and being sent to the Rio Grande, is said to be nearly equal to the army of occupation under Gen. Taylor. What can it mean? It is more than suspected that somebody is picking a quarrel with Mexico, determined to have more of her land. Does our government wink at such proceedings, or will it speak out a deserved rebuke? Be it as it may, the fact that such a movement is on foot shows the spirit that is abroad in the land.

God never looks with allowance upon such a spirit, and unless it be checked He will frown upon our country, and it will wither under his curse. The cry of injured Mexico has already gone up to Him, and a fresh provocation may call down deserved vengeance. There is a lamentable want of moral principle among us. Our consciences are dead on the subject. Deceived by the false glare and glory of wealth and a wide-extended territory, we suffer these schemes to be cooked up and consummated without so much as a shake of the head by way of disapproval. The cure for this moral apathy is only in the just and glorious teachings of the Bible.

We now live in a land of religious freedom. Our fathers, when they landed on Plymouth rock, planted there the tree of liberty, and it has since flourished and borne glorious fruit. Religious oppressors have stood afar off, and wondered in great astonishment. The Pope of Rome has found one corner of this beautiful earth where he can not set his foot upon the neck of humanity, and choke down all advancement. He has found one nation that could defy his power, and hurl back his anathemas into his own teeth. He has been compelled to content himself with one corner of our tent to rest in. The horrors of the inquisition he has not been able to exhibit to American eyes. But he is not yet dead. The spirit of Popery has not yet lost its rabid thirst for power and domination. It has not yet cleansed its skirts from the blood of the martyrs, and we fear it has not yet lost its thirst for blood. It is still the grim advocate of ignorance and superstition, and the most bitter enemy of our free institutions. Its recent effort in two of our cities to strike down the public school system, shows what we may expect from it when it gains the ascendancy; and that event is not far distant, if we suffer our children to grow up without a proper moral training. Its exclusiveness, its reluctance to mingle with Protestants, is anti-republican, having a tendency to create independent cliques and clans among those who should be united. With lustful eye, the Pope of Rome is now watching our comparatively free and happy country, longing to seize it in his holy embrace, and make it like despotism-cursed Italy, an example of his converting, transforming, renovating, liberalizing power.

No layman, be he ever so well informed, would be permited to think and act religiously for himself. The horrors of the inquisition would be presented to the American eye. The dungeon, the rack, the sword and faggot, would be resorted to as a punishment for heretics, and the wailings and lamentations of tortured and dying victims would be heard all over the land. While we respect the learning and talent of the Romish clergy, we condemn in the most liberal terms their despotic policy. We as Protestants and the preservers of religious liberty, must meet these influences, or our land will ere long groan under the crushing weight of papal despotism. We must promote Bible reading and Bible study wherever we can, as a mortal thrust at this anti-christian principle, knowing full well, that wherever the glorious light of the Bible shines unobscured by papal traditions, the gloomy clouds of popery will flee away, and men will bask in the sunshine of religious liberty.

I have hitherto been showing reasons existing within ourselves, why we should adopt a more efficient system of religious instruction. I will now step out of our nation, and see if I may not be able to find other and external reasons for the same. Here is found a rich mine of thought—the relations and influence of our country with and upon surrounding nations, and the consequent duties growing out of them. Our position is peculiar. We exist in a deeply interesting age. Startling events are multiplying around us. The human mind is waking up and shaking itself from the slumber of ages. The anti-narcotic doses given by Luther and his coadjutors are now working most potently. The palladium of despotism is being shaken to its foundations. The whole of Europe is one vast bed of volcanic fire, covered up and smothered by her despotic institutions, but destined, as sure as fate, to burst forth and consume its adversaries. Hungary lies bleeding at the feet of Austria, backed up by the growling Russian Bear. Italy lies couchant at the feet of the Pope, like a lion half aroused to the consciousness of its own strength, and exhibiting unmistakable signs of impatience under the heavy burdens laid upon him. France is sweating under the "coup d'etat" of Louis Napoleon. Ireland is smarting under British oppression, and fleeing for protection to the American eagle. The political atmosphere of Europe bodes a tremendous earthquake, which will shake the world and cause rivers of blood to flow. The great furnace of war is being heated up. The demon of war is burnishing his arms, preparing his war-chariot, and training his steeds to enter the ranks where drunken conflict reels. The Czar of Russia is marshaling his mighty hosts to dash against the Ottoman Empire, while the Turk, supported by the combined power of England and France, is preparing to breast the tremendous torrent that is about to be poured upon him from the North. The next gale that sweeps wailing across the Atlantic, may bear upon its wings the noise of booming cannon, the crash of musketry, the clashing of steel with steel, and the groans of the dying. What it will cost, and where it will end, is beyond mortal ken. Thou haughty autocrat of the North, thou art provoking thine own destiny, and that of thy protoge, Austria. Thou wilt be the loser, and bleeding Hungary will escape and become free, as she deserves. Thou canst not withstand the combined powers of Europe; and Austria, quarreling with America, can not help thee. Pause and consider, then, if thou wouldst not rush upon destruction.

The great Empire of China is convulsed from center to circumference. An army of Barbarico-Christians is sweeping the land with the besom of destruction, and likely to subvert the present Government. What the results of such a movement will be, is known only to an all-seeing Eye. In the midst of this universal struggle, it is next to impossible that the American Republic should remain neutral. It will be the prayer of all the truly good, that she stand for the right, and throw her broad wings of protection over the oppressed and downtrodden. Is she prepared for such action? We fear she is not. The doctrines of the Bible have not been interwoven into the existence of our people enough to show them clearly what their duty is in the present emergency. More of the leaven of righteousness should have been thrown into the mass of our people, to prepare them for proper action. Future contingencies of more consequence may come upon us as a nation. Shall we be prepared for them? God grant that we may. To this end let us labor, with prayerfulness disseminating the truths of the Bible throughout every nook and corner of our country, by any agency that we can justly use.

SHILOH, N. J., Aug. 29, 1853.

THE PRAIRIE FIRE AND THE RUM FIRE.

BY REV. JOHN PIERPONT.

The prairie fire! at midnight's hour
  The traveler hears it roaring by—
A form of terror and of power,
  That walks the earth, and licks the sky.

The wild deer, on his grassy bed,
  Wakes from his dream of breaking day,
Listens, and lifts his antlered head,
  Snuffs the hot blast, and bounds away.

Where that destroying angel goes,
  Borne on the wings of autumn's wind,
He leaves no grass, no prairie rose,
  But all is scorched and black behind.

But when spring comes, a flowery belt,
  Across the prairie's bosom thrown,
Shows us that where his foot was felt,
  The angel dropped a jeweled zone.

But there's a fire, along whose track
  Spring never scatters flowers in bloom;
No spring e'er follows—all is black
  As midnight in a hopeless tomb.

Alike upon the low and high
  Falls this strange fire; it feeds and plays
On beauty's cheek, in wisdom's eye,
  And melts down manhood in its blaze.

And youth and age—its power is such—
  Blossom and fruit alike are burned;
And every virtue by its touch
  Is shriveled, and to ashes turned.

Quench, holy Father, by thy power,
  By love and law, with spring and well,
With stream and cistern, flood and shower,
  In mercy quench this fire of hell.

LETTER FROM PALESTINE.

The Philadelphia Christian Observer has recently printed two letters from Mrs. C. S. Minor, now in Palestine, to her son in this country. At the request of Bro. T. B. Stillman, we transfer one of them to our columns this week, and shall probably give the other in our next.

JERUSALEM, May 24th, 1853.

MY BELOVED SON,—As you are already informed, we were driven from our house in the rainy season, at such a distance from friends and home, without a prospect of redress or aid, in this uncivilized land, so destitute of employment or opportunities of livelihood. But the "Lord seeth not as man seeth," and has used our trials and necessities to lead us into a wider and more promising field of usefulness. Our kind and noble Christian brother, Dr. Barclay, an American missionary in Jerusalem, gave us shelter and rooms in the Mission House on Mt. Zion. We had brought, as you know, all our useful furnitnre, bedding, and some surplus clothing; all that we could spare, we immediately sold to a surprising advantage, as such things are hardly to be obtained here. With this money we have paid every expense since.

Here we found ourselves compulsorily shut within the walls of Jerusalem, and our labors at a stand; but we cried much to the Lord for direction, expecting of necessity we must return home. Before we left Artas, our Arab neighbors had made the most substantial and affecting demonstrations of sympathy and regard for us, and great indignation at our persecutors, and had entreated us to come to their village, and reside with them—offered us their land, "with or without money," and almost compelled us by their kind importunities. Soon after we came to Jerusalem, we began to receive calls and kind expressions of sympathy from the Jews, congratulating us in our separation from Meshullam, and entreating us not to leave their land; that now they had more hope of our success in helping their people, than before; that with Meshullam they could not approach us—none but the ignorant, compelled by veriest necessity, would go near him. As we became more acquainted with the Jews, some of their first men promised any number of respectable men to labor with us, if we would begin again separate. They are very anxious to work with us. We have received much useful information about different localities of watered soil, and the general features of the land in Judea. We have had several offers to occupy in different places. Artas and Jaffa seemed for a time to present the best and nearly equal prospects; but we still waited to have an answer from friends at home, desiring to acquiesce in their advice. The Artas Arabs came frequently to hear from you. They will let us have all the best and upper part of the valley, on a lease for 20 years. The Turkish law makes it the lesee's by possession afterwards. At Jaffa there is recently a surprising opening, and opportunity to obtain the finest land very low. The 6th of May, we were invited to spend the day in the country, in a beautiful valley shaded with olives, by Mr. and Mrs. H., (converted Israelites,) who throughout have been very friendly and kind to us, having known me on my first visit here. We spent the day very pleasantly, and shared an excellent cold repast provided by them. The sun was sinking, and we must soon return before the gates would close. I stole away in a lone nook among the rocks, and bowed my face to the earth—(the time had been long while we had been waiting, and no answer had returned from the United States)—the lonely hills and vales seemed more lovely that day than ever before, from my recent confinement in the city; fragrant flowers were thick around me, the silvery foliage of the olive waved over my head, and must I leave the sacred and long cherished land of my hope, my faith, and my sufferings? I left my burden there; and returned to the happy faces who waited for me. Just then, we saw a dear young friend, (the youngest son of Dr. Barclay,) galloping toward us. He said he came to bring us tidings, and his bright eyes gleamed with joy while he kept us in playful suspense. He soon relieved me by stating that his father had received the most satisfactory letters for us. "Now, now," said our dear Hebrew friend, "you will not leave this land?" And as we walked home, different vallies and places were discussed as most convenient to the Jews.

We found in the package copies of letters from the principal donors to Meshullam, confirming our statements respecting the purpose of all donations which Meshullam had written for, to be appropriated to himself only; also kind and encouraging words of sympathy, and $200 to aid the common cause! Thus far, as you know, according to the decisions of the Consuls (American and British,) our own private means have defrayed our expenses of living, besides supporting Mr. Meshullam and family while in his connection; so also now, we felt that this remittance must be faithfully applied to our first and true object—employing Jews to cultivate their own land. Our Jewish friends came in and rejoiced with us, and it became our serious inquiry, how, and where, shall we occupy? We set apart the next Sabbath to pray and entreat the Lord's direction. As the sun was sinking, a German (Christian) friend arrived from Jaffa, who came to tell us that his farm was at our service. Next morning one of our most enterprising Jewish friends came and offered to accompany us down the mountains to see it. We then decided to go on a visit of a few days to Jaffa, and look at several gardens. So, accompanied by this German farmer, and Mordecai, (a Jew, who wished to engage in this work,) we set out on donkeys, as the cheapest conveyance. The first night we slept at Ramlah, at the house of a wealthy native Italian, who greatly prides himself as a Consul for Americans. We were treated with the greatest attention, in his fine airy house. From the terraces we had the most luxurious view of Oriental scenery imaginable—the wide, undulating plains, extending on every side, mostly covered with yellow grain—dense groves of olives near the city, interspersed with waving palms—here and there a tower, a convent, and antique ruins, and the well-built stone dwellings, watered gardens, &c.

On the way we had passed large droves of cattle, sheep and goats, camels and donkeys, feeding at leisure. Our host had 100 cattle, 2,000 sheep and goats, 30 horses, and many wheat fields and gardens near Jaffa. Some miles before reaching Jaffa, we left the main road, and pursued a path to the right, and reached the house of Mr. G. (the German) about ten o'clock.

We found a beautiful rich piece of soil, over 20 acres, with a fine, even slope, partly planted with different varieties of fruit, just beginning to bear—pomegranate, orange, peach, apple, lemon, mulberry, and vines, bananas and figs. Two other Germans, and one woman and three children, were here, (a part of the Colony who wrote to us in 1850,) and another owns a farm nearer the sea, in sight. The house was small, but pleasant, standing on an eminence, commanding a view of Jaffa and the Sea, and the vessels at anchor more than a mile distant, southward.

Our devoted friend Abdallah, (a powerful and active Arab, who had from the first formed a strong attachment, laboring with them last season, manifesting a great interest in their improved system of agriculture,) being stubbornly decided not to return to Artas, near Meshullam, without us, had preceded us on foot, as by instinct, some days before, and was hard at work. Words can scarcely describe his joy, while tears streamed down his dark face, as he lifted us from the saddle. This was Tuesday, and we remained until Thursday evening, and visited several places; and, after much consideration, we made an arrangement to come to Jaffa. We had not means to accept the liberal offer of the German, and take the whole garden, but by our arrangement, we have the entire use of one-half the soil and fruit, &c.

After the Jews in Jaffa heard that we had arrived there, we received an invitation to visit the President (or chief Rabbi) of the Jews in Jaffa. He received us very kindly, expressed great satisfaction at our coming and effort, promised to visit us, and said any number of his poor people would be glad to work; that himself owned a very large garden (they are generally from 30 to 50 acres each,) but that he did not understand cultivation, and had to depend on Arabs; that his object in seeing us was to offer his land to us, having much fruit, a house, a well in good order, three good mules, and a donkey—all of which he offered to us for 4000 piasters (24 piasters to the dollar) for five years, or 8000 piasters for 10 years. O, how my heart ached to think how few and weak were our hands, and how great is the call for true hearts and strong hands to enter the open door in Jaffa to labor for Israel. We told him we were at present engaged, but I hoped other faithful persons would soon come, and we would promise him to give his garden a preference, in extending our work. * *

We have rented a comfortable and very pleasant new house for 1000 piasters per annum, as there was no room for us in Mr. G.'s small house. We considered how much our health had suffered the past year for need of a comfortable shelter, and how much our hands had been hindered by having most of our things stowed in Bethlehem—some in a tent on one mountain, and some in a stable, and cooking, and working, and running from one fig-tree to another, out of doors, exposed to the noon-day sun; and, we do esteem it our indispensable necessity, and the cheapest and only judicious course. The house that we have rented, with its two gardens and fixtures, machinery, &c., cost the rich owner 200,000 piasters; but soon after it was finished he died, and it being so far out of Jaffa, the merchants will not rent it. Mr. Murad, our Consul at Jaffa (who is very kind to us) made out the papers with the Turkish owner, and said, if it was nearer, it would easily rent for 2000 or 3000 piasters. We prefer it for being distant, and elevated, having the sea-breeze constantly, and only a few rods from our work. There are several small farms near Mr. G.'s to be bought very low, from 5000 to 8000 piasters each.

Dr. Barclay and his sons had been on a tour to Gaza, and met us at Jaffa, visited us at the gardens, and kindly assisted us in interpreting at the Consulate, &c.

All around, back of the gardens, are extensive wheat fields, to be bought or leased at a low rate. Our eyes never beheld such a rich, extended scene of continuous grain, ready to harvest—in some places on a level as far as the eye could reach.

On Thursday evening, we returned to our kind Consular host in Ramlah. He had just entertained 15 American officers, on their return from Jerusalem to their ship (St. Louis) lying at Jaffa, and was in high spirits about Americans. When he understood our errand to Jaffa, he regretted that he had not known that we wanted land, and begged us to remain with him another day, and visit his farms, about two hours ride from Jaffa. Finding that we could not do this, he insisted on our removing to Jaffa, and offered us one of his gardens, with its fruits, well, machinery, house, &c., for 8000 piasters, with a secure title, and that he would engage to protect us. He is a great man among his people, and would have such power.

We returned next day to Jerusalem, much impressed with the prospect opening on the plains of Sharon, near Jaffa, for self-sacrificing, humble, Christian labor—such an opportunity as has never before been known here, acknowledged by all with whom we have conversed. Now we are perplexed with applications, more than we can encourage. We have engaged two poor families of Jews, who are enterprising and intelligent; giving them 100 per month each, a patch of ground, and seeds, and tools, and teaching them how to plant, and they have what they can raise, and feed and support themselves. We do this to give them a sample of the substantial benefit they might receive from cultivation. We consider this as altogether the most judicious and effectual plan of permanently enlisting them in cultivation. Now, if the Jew is industrious, and raises potatoes, peas, &c., and takes them to his family or to market, he has the sweet taste of his own labor. We have engaged the two families thus to commence. They have children at the Jewish school, and if they take them away, they lose all their share out of the synagogue fund of support. This they are willing to do, if we will teach their children in our house—one family wishing to reside in a part of it! One hundred dollars would enable us, in our plain way of living, to provide for a teacher and school, and thus we should have the rare fact of Jews living with us, working on the soil with us for their own interest, and having a school in our house of Jewish children, taught the Scriptures by Christians! * * * *

THE FIRST TRACT SOCIETY.

To an observant mind, it appears a striking fact in the providence of God, that nearly all our public institutions have so originated, that no man, nor any party of men, can claim to be their originators; but while many have acted, and done much, the whole honor must redound to God. He has made a multitude of agencies contribute to one grand result. It would be easy to illustrate this truth by a reference to our religious tract operations. We may trace the commencement of our tract societies in this country, from the one to the other, and so to the Religious Tract Society in London, which began its labors in 1799. But that Society was not the beginning of Societies. Let us see how an institution was previously at work in Edinburgh.

The late Rev. John Campbell, afterwards the celebrated missionary traveler in Africa, and who died a Congregational pastor in London, was in early life a jeweler in Scotland, and while settled in business at Edinburgh, was very active in teaching Lord's-day evening schools, visiting the sick, and in other ways advancing the cause of human happiness. He was thus led to the work of distributing religious tracts; the account is from his own pen:—

"I think it was while looking over a bundle of pamphlets at a book stall, that I observed one of a religious cast, entitled, 'The Life and Experience of F. S,' (or, as I afterwards heard, Fanny Sydney,) published by some bookseller in England. It was only eight pages, stitched in a blue cover, which I purchased for twopence. On reading it, I was so pleased with the simplicity and piety of the narrative, that I got an edition printed, part of which was sold, and the rest circulated gratis. While on a visit to London, having fallen in with the fine old story of 'Poor Joseph' in verse, I printed an edition of it on my return to Edinburgh, which I circulated among friends. The next I published was Mr. Newton's [poem on the] second anniversary of Mrs. Newton's death; a printed copy of which he sent me in a frank, which I reprinted, and presented copies to friends. During the three succeeding years he sent me, in manuscript, the third, fourth, and fifth anniversaries of the same event, all poems; which I gave away also among friends—presenting also a portion of them to the author. Acting in this little way, as a tract circulator, for a few years from 1789, it occurred to some friends, that something more effectual might be done in this way, by forming a little Society for the express purpose of printing and circulating religious tracts. When the matter was mentioned to me, I highly approved of it, and was one of about a dozen who formed ourselves into a Religious Tract Society. This, as far as I know, was the first Society of the kind that ever existed in the world."

"Behold how great a fire a little matter kindleth!" The circulation of the London Tract Society, for last year alone, exceeded twenty-five millions, and that of the American Societies at New York and Boston could have been but little less. What a mighty machine for the elevation of the world, so wonderfully originating by the good hand of God!

DO YOU PRAY?

DAVID did. His circumstances, indeed, were unfavorable. A crown was upon his head. The cares of a kingdom pressed him. He might have said, "I have no time." But he prayed much. It was one of his most influential habits. What proofs and illustrations abound in those wonderful compositions, the Psalms. How touching, earnest, sublime often, were his cries unto God. How have his spiritual exercises been an incitement and pattern of devotion in every succeeding age.

DANIEL did. He was indeed a statesman and courtier. He lived in the midst of idolaters. To them his religion was offensive. The king bade him not to pray unto Jehovah. If he did, it was at mortal peril. The great men of Babylon conspired to make this very thing the means of his ruin. Still he prayed. He did it, not ostentatiously, but without concealment. His religious principle was stronger than his fear of men. "Three times a day he kneeled and prayed and gave thanks before his God, as aforetime."

PAUL did. It was the first pulse and expression of his new life in Christ. "Behold he prayeth!" said the Spirit. The fact, was the surprising but conclusive proof of his spiritual change and transition. From being Saul the persecutor, it was thus shown, he he had become Paul the saint. However, after that event, was his life one of prayer as well as heroic labor—of prayer for himself—for his countrymen—for the Gentile world—for the blood-bought church. Holier, intenser, sublimer aspirations, probably never ascended from a soul this side of heaven.

JESUS CHRIST did. It is a most impressive truth. It ought to be pondered by all who do not pray. The Saviour was perfect. He was divine. He sustained no such relations of dependence as we sustain. He had no sins to be forgiven. There were in him no lusts to be restrained and purified. He was subject to no temptations he could not resist. He was assailed by no enemies he could not conquer. He had life in himself. He had creative power. He had infinite merit. But he prayed. He prayed in secret and with his disciples.

"Cold mountains and the midnight air Witnessed the fervor of his prayer."

Yes—David, Daniel, Paul, Jesus Christ, all prayed. They were men of prayer.

Do you pray? [Presbyterian of the West.

BIBLE DISTRIBUTION.

It is said that there was a time when a copy of the Scriptures would cost, to a grazier, half his herd of cattle, or, perhaps, two arches of London bridge as it then stood; but now every laborer in this land can purchase a Bible. In France, Bibles are sold for less than a franc; and even in the language of China, which it was thought, a few years ago, European intellects could hardly master, they are printed and distributed, at a cost of sixpence each copy. Now, then, that the books are ready, and the cost is cheapened, and readers are multiplying, this, surely, is a call to action. But other things combine to make it so. This country and the United States have access, by their commerce, to all the shores of the earth, and may, therefore, have connection with those nations that demand the Scriptures at our hands. An Englishman, or an American, is protected by his national flag and by a Consular Minister, and thus, notwithstanding many impediments in the way, liberty of conscience does creep on among the nations of the world. Restrictive laws, if they have not ceased, have at least become intolerable and odious to mankind; and when they are put into exercise, as in the case of the Madiai and Guicciardini, they only serve to bring out the deep hatred that is felt against persecution and intolerance. Then we have liberty of action. A short time since, in Turkey, it was death for a Mahometan to change his religion, and it was death to any Christian man who attempted to effect the change. Now, however, I believe, religious liberty is as complete, or nearly so, in Turkey, as it is here. A few years ago, we prayed to our Heavenly Father to influence the heart of the Emperor of China, that he might allow some moderate share of liberty to our fellow Christians. Now, in the consular cities of China, and in all populous neighborhoods, a Christian man may engage in any Christian efforts with as much impunity, nay, with as much liberty, as he could do in any of the great cities in this island. A FITTING RESOLVE.

At a missionary prayer meeting in Mangaia, after the whole Bible had been received in their own language, an aged disciple, in rising to address the people from Job 5: 17-19, said: "I have often spoken to you from a text out of other parts of the Bible which we had; but this is the first time we have seen the book of Job in our own language. It is a new book to us. When I received my Bible, I never slept until I had finished this new book of Job. I read it all. Oh, what joy I felt in the wonderful life of this good man! Let us read the whole book. Let us go to the missionary, by day and by night, and inquire into the meaning of the new parts which we have not read. Let us be at his door when he rises; let us stop him when we meet him, that he may tell us of these new books." And, lifting his new Bible before the congregation, with the excited energy of a feeble old man, he said: "My brethren and sisters, this is my resolve. The dust shall never cover my new Bible; the moths shall never eat it; the mildew shall never rot it! My light! My joy!"

The Sabbath Recorder.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

It is hoped that the Anniversary season so near at hand will not be forgotten by our people. Only two weeks remain, till our different Societies will be convened at Adams. Shall we not see a goodly gathering? We hope so. The place is very convenient of access by the Rome and Watertown Railroad, the ability of the friends to entertain ample, and their hospitality of the most liberal kind; and we understand that they are very anxious to witness a large assemblage. Let them not be disappointed.

To those who have not visited Adams, we would say, that it is a charming spot of earth. Seventh-day Baptists are no where more beautifully and advantageously located, than they are in that vicinity. Those who have not made their summer trip away from home, would do well to avail themselves of this Sabbath season of the year—lovely autumn—to invigorate their lungs with the pure breezes that play along the shores of Lake Ontario.

We trust that our Adams friends will not be so ambitious to do up a princely style of hospitality, that they will not allow themselves time for all the meetings, from first to last. A few years ago, we ventured to hint to the good housekeepers of the place where we were about to be gathered, the propriety of getting their baking, and such other extra jobs as are usually put off till Sixth-day, all done before the commencement of the meetings, so that they might have ample opportunity to attend them all; and we believe the hint had a good effect. At all events, we know that there was no lack of good congregations on that occasion. We go to such places, not to feast, but to do the Master's business; and we do not want our Marthas to be cumbered about much serving.

We bespeak the prayers of our brethren, that the approaching season may be one of profit to those who attend, and that it may contribute largely to promote the great cause which we all profess to love. No former anniversary season has been of greater importance than this one is likely to be. The world is assuming a new phase in regard to opportunities for Christian effort. Doors of usefulness are opening on every hand, and never was there a time when the friends of the Bible Sabbath were more clearly pointed, by the finger of Providence, to their duty. Now is the time for effort, and now is the time when we need to have our efforts wisely directed. Yet now is the time when Satan will be most busy to distract our counsels. No greater calamity could befall us than to have dissensions spring up just at this time, when all the leadings of Providence are calling for the most vigorous outlays of our united strength. The Lord forbid that, when his people come to present themselves before him, Satan should come also among them. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem."

There is no more fruitful source of trouble to Christian assemblies, than the coming up of some with the fixed determination to carry a favorite point. And when this determination, not content with open, honorable, and dignified discussion, resorts to artful maneuverings to compass its policy, the result is sure to be any thing but peaceful. There is no estimating the mischief which one unyielding, self-willed and self-opinioned spirit is capable of creating in this way. If there is one among us who can detect in himself any thing of this spirit, or feels in the smallest degree like going up to our anniversaries with such a determination, we hope he will first set himself apart to fasting and prayer, that the evil spirit may be cast out; for 'this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting.'

We do not make these remarks, as implying that there are such persons among us, or that there is a probability that our approaching convocation will be subjected to any such disturbance. Nevertheless, we are all men of like passions with the rest of the human race, and timely caution with regard to what has been the occasion of trouble to others, may be of service to ourselves.

An ambition to shine as a shrewd debater, or as a dispenser of smart sayings, does not become the place where Christians are gathered together. Shrewd debaters are not generally remarkable for their influence over deliberative bodies, although they often succeed remarkably in embarrassing the proceedings. And where shrewdness is accompanied with that disposition which endeavors to render an opponent as contemptible as possible, the possessor of it is generally more despised than respected, notwithstanding the prowess with which he acquits himself. As for the dealer in witticisms, his influence is still less, if possible, to say nothing of the diluting effect of such things upon the mind of the jester himself. Dignity, forbearance, and love, are eminently becoming the assemblies of those who deliberate upon the things pertaining to the kingdom of God.

On the whole, we trust that the approaching season will be one of good, and that from the different parts of our Zion brethren will come together anxious only to glorify God; and that, when they separate, they will feel themselves to be brethren still. T. B. B.

THE WAY THEY KEEP SUNDAY IN LONDON.—A correspondent of the New Haven Register says that all the lines of omnibuses are in full activity on Sunday, conveying to the towns and villages around the metropolis thousands and tens of thousands of city workers of both sexes, who are not able to taste fresh air except on that day. The little iron steamers of the Thames are loaded full of a Sunday, to carry up and down the river the votaries of pleasure who crowd upon the docks. And then all the railroads of the metropolis are in full blast on Sunday, carrying passengers at a cheap rate to the various points and localities most interesting to strangers and others. Windsor Castle is thronged with visitors on Sundays, the Queen's band discoursing most delightful music in the garden of the palace, commencing immediately after divine service. This band, composed of about forty well-instructed performers, attract vast multitudes to the gardens and grounds around Windsor Castle, on the day above named. Probably a finer band of instrumental performers cannot be found in all Europe. It is the favorite of the court and people. Eating houses, drinking shops, confectioneries, &c., are allowed to accommodate their customers without let or hindrance. In a word, Sunday is a holiday to the masses in London, as it is to the masses of almost every city in Europe, either Catholic or Protestant.

SEA OF LIFE.

An Allegory.

In one of my oft-repeated day-dreams, methought I stood upon a headland, jutting far out into an unknown and mysterious sea. Its waters were bright and sparkling; its waves had a quiet, joyous roll. Innumerable islands dotted its surface, while flowers and fruits bespoke the gorgeousness and luxuriance of tropical climes. The breezes that swept gently among them, were laden with fragrance and gladness. Every pleasure seemed to find here a most captivating abode. It is true, that ever and anon there could be seen mist and cloud and storm, sweeping along the distant horizon, dipping, like some dark-plumed bird, their pinions in the foam-crested wave; but they soon disappeared and all was bright again, and then there was seen spanning each cloud the ever present bow of promise.

As I stood intently gazing upon this scene of beauty, the shore of this sea was suddenly lined with a countless throng of human beings. They were youthful in appearance. Joy played upon every countenance. Hope beamed from every eye. At sight of the sea before them, they clapped their youthful hands, and gave repeated shouts of gladness. As they stood there, gazing upon the bright waters and happy isles, the waves playfully laving their feet, an eagerness to embark upon this sea took possession of their young hearts. Many, in their desire to taste of the sweets before them, plunged into the waves accoutered as they were. The waters at first were cool and bracing, but this very coolness soon chilled the limbs of the inexperienced swimmers, and after vain efforts to sustain themselves, their warm hearts became benumbed, hope died within their breasts, and they sank in despair, to rise no more. The waves rolled above their heads as quietly as they rolled before.

A part of the throng upon the shore, warned by the fate of their companions, turned back and began to build to themselves vessels by which they might sail this sea; but, in their haste to be upon it, they built naught but canoes, skiffs, or at most but small pleasure boats. With these they hoped to reach the beautiful isles, and there be enabled to pass their days in safety and pleasure. They set forth in their frail barks. Songs of mirth and gayety arose, as they glided over the glassy deep. They fancied themselves the happiest of mortals. But being inexperienced, and withal very reckless of consequences, they soon began to strand upon shoals and rocks that lay concealed just beneath the surface. Anon, storms arose, tempests lowered about them, thunderbolts shot thick and fast over their defenseless heads, and when the mists and storm passed away, their shattered barks were seen stranded along the shore, or piled upon the islands, while but few of the once happy group remained to mourn the fate of their companions.

There was another class who, with more prudence than the first, spent a longer time in preparation. They took more pains in fitting up to themselves vessels. They constructed brigs, schooners, sloops, and small ships. They were scheming and calculating, with the stirring, brisk, bustling air of business. They constructed and navigated their vessels with a good degree of skill. However, by the smallness of their craft, and from the want of extensive knowledge and experience, they were compelled to do mostly a coastwise trade, not venturing too frequently or too far out into unknown or unfrequented seas. They nevertheless drove a profitable trade, adding much to the common interest and common comfort of humanity.

But among the vast multitude which I at first saw standing on the shore, I beheld, now and then, one with more thoughtful mien than the rest. They entered upon their preparation for embarking upon the sea before them, with unusual care. They surveyed long and well the difficulties and dangers which they would have to encounter, and prepared everything accordingly. The experience and wisdom of others were carefully sought. Charts were diligently studied. After long years of toil, their vessels, also, were ready, and when they came to launch them, I beheld that they were nearly all majestic steamers. These were all well officered and manned, and every preparation made, every precaution taken, necessary for safety and success. They traversed and explored unknown seas, and visited other continents. They opened ports before closed to the genial influence of trade and civilization, and binding different people together by the common interests of humanity, they were looked upon as universal benefactors. Their approach to different shores was hailed by waiting nations, and if, perchance, now and then, one went down as they sailed the uncertain and stormy sea, the world mourned the loss. *

CATHOLIC VIEW OF SUNDAY.

It is refreshing to meet with a statement of religious belief which is manifestly honest, though it be as manifestly erroneous. The following, copied from a Roman Catholic publication, called a "Catechism of the Christian Religion," is a specimen. We commend it to the consideration of those hair-splitting theologians who, whenever they undertake to explain the fourth commandment, have, so much to say about a seventh day, and a seventh part of time, that so they may prepare the way for the introduction of an unauthorized change in the day of the Sabbath, without, as they think, invalidating the commandment.

Q. What is the third commandment?

A. Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day: six days shalt thou labor, and shalt do all thy work; but on the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; thou shalt do no work on it, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy beast, nor the stranger that is within thy gates, &c. Ex. xx, 8, &c.

Q. Why does God commence this commandment by the words, "Remember, &c.?"

A. To remind the Jews that this commandment is only a confirmation of one that had been always observed, by his order, since the beginning of the world. Gen. ii, 3; Ex. xvi, 23.

Q. What does God ordain by this commandment?

A. He ordains that we sanctify, in a special manner, this day, on which he rested from the labor of creation.

Q. What is this day of rest?

A. The seventh day of the week, or Saturday, for he employed six days in creation, and rested on the seventh. Gen. ii, 2; Heb. iv, 1, &c.

Q. Is it then Saturday we should sanctify, in order to obey the ordinance of God?

A. During the old law, Saturday was the day sanctified; but the church, instructed by Jesus Christ, and directed by the Spirit of God, has substituted Sunday for Saturday, so we now sanctify the first and not the seventh day. Sunday means, and now is, the day of the Lord.

Q. Had the church power to make such change?

A. Certainly, since the Spirit of God is her guide, the change is inspired by that holy Spirit. The uniform, universal, and perpetual tradition of all ages and nations, attests the antiquity of, and consequently the Divine assent to, this change; even the bitterest enemies of God's church admit and adopt it.

Q. Why did the church make this change?

A. Because Christ rose from the dead upon Sunday, and rested from the great work of Redemption; and because on this day the Holy Spirit descended on the apostles and on the church.

SABBATH-SCHOOL CELEBRATION.

The Sabbath-School connected with the Pawcatuck Seventh-day Baptist Church had a pic-nic excursion and celebration on the 31st of August; of which the following account is given by Alfred B. Burdick in the Literary Echo and Pawcatuck Advertiser:—

At about 8 o'clock A. M. the Sabbath-School, parents and invited guests, to the number of about 225, embarked on board one of those "square-toed packets" with which our river abounds, and which, by the way, cannot be outdone in point of convenience and safety for conveying large companies of children, by any mode which we know of. The day was fine, all hearts were full of gladness, and every countenance beamed with pleasure.

A delightful sail of about one hour, which was made doubly pleasing by the soul-stirring music of the "Citizen's Brass Band of Westerly," and singing by the Sabbath-School Choir, brought us to Osbrook, whose mingled scenery of ocean, grove, and meadow, was truly inviting.

After some preliminaries, such as preparing tables for refreshments, a stand for the Band, erecting and occupying swings, &c., an organization was effected by the choice of Rev. Joel Greene, President, and A. B. Burdick, Secretary.

The following is the Programm of Exercises which then followed:—

Music by the Citizen's Brass Band of Westerly.

Invocation by Rev. L. Crandall.

Singing by the School.

Address by N. H. Langworthy, Superintendent.

Address by James Stillman—Subject, Past and Present Religious Liberty.

Music by the Band.

Address by Edward Burdick—Subject, Our Country.

Address by J. Dennison Spicer.

Music by the Band.

Address by E. R. Darrow—Subject, Sabbath-Schools.

Singing.

Address by Rev. L. Crandall.

Address by Rev. Joel Greene.

Music by the Band.

Address by the Pastor, Rev. A. B. Burdick.

At the conclusion of these truly interesting exercises, the President, in behalf of the Committee of Arrangements, requested all to repair to the tables and partake of the refreshments which were in inviting readiness. The clergy took the center of the table on the west, and the Band the center on the east. Blessing invoked by Rev. L. Crandall. Near the conclusion of the refreshments, which passed off in good taste, the following Regular Toasts were read by the Secretary:—

1. Sabbath-Schools—May their object ever be to prepare the young to enter the Higher School which is taught above by the "Lord of the Sabbath."

2. The Superintendent—Ever prompt in the discharge of duty, may the Divine Superintendent direct, and the happy results of his past faithfulness cheer him in his pathway.

3. Teachers of the Sabbath-School—In order that they may be qualified for their important labors of love, may they ever feel the necessity of listening to the instruction of the Great Teacher that came down from heaven.

4. Citizen's Brass Band of Westerly—May they ever be bound to the hearts of our citizens by ties stronger and more enduring than Bands of Brass.

Responded to by A. J. Foster, leader of the Band, as follows:—

"Though our instruments are but sounding brass and tinkling cymbals, still we aim at the cultivation of a science ennobling in its character and heavenly in its origin."

Each toast was responded to by a voluntary from the Band.

The Exercises in the Grove were closed by the peformance of "Sweet Home" by the Band and the Company.

THE LIQUOR LAW IN NEW YORK.

The Prohibitory Liquor Law which was brought before the Legislature of New York at its last session, passed the Senate by a vote of 17 to 13. In the Assembly it was lost by a vote of 56 to 54. In view of this result, the Executive Committee of the New York State Temperance Society have issued an Address to the Friends of Temperance throughout the State, the material part of which we copy:—

Friends of Temperance, our just expectations thus painfully disappointed by our public servants—what shall we do? Shall we humbly acknowledge their superior virtue and wisdom, and acquiesce in the propriety of their action? or shall we remove them from the places they occupy, and substitute for them men who will give their influence and votes to secure the passage of the Maine Law?

The State Temperance Society has been hitherto, it is well known, averse to carrying their cause into the arena of politics. They have had no wish, nor have they sought to divide parties or distract them. They saw, or thought they saw, some serious evils in such a course, and endeavored to shun them. Besides, it seemed to them desirable to exhaust, manifestly to all men, whatever of power may lie in a calm appeal to the intelligence and moral sense of our legislators, before resorting to measures more stringent; in order that, when the suppression of intemperance should, in their opinion, imperatively demand these, they might be justified in employing them, by all virtuous and judicious men. Hence, so recently as a few weeks since, they instructed the President to address the lower branch of the Legislature, and urge the passage of the Maine Law before its adjournment, with distinct reference to the possibility, or rather the certainty, otherwise, of its disturbing the harmony of existing parties, and going, at the next and succeeding elections, as a ruling question to the polls.

But nothing more, we conceive, can be gained by appeals of this nature. All who can feel the force of facts and arguments addressed to their understanding, have, it is believed, embraced our cause. It is obvious that we are now opposed, in the main, if not wholly, by banded interests, and majorities under their influence; and to suppose that we can persuade these to legislate for Temperance, and especially to pass the Maine Law, is just as reasonable as to expect tears from stones. "They will not be persuaded, though one should rise from the dead."

The time has come, then, foreseen by many, when the friends of Temperance must adopt a different line of conduct. Our opponents have left us no choice. They are inaccessible to reason; they are immovable in purpose; and by employing the ballot-box, they have been able, year after year, to secure majorities in the Legislature, as inaccessible to reason and as immovable in purpose as themselves. To be overthrown they must be met on their own ground, and fought with their own weapons. To look for their discomfiture by means of an array of facts, however imposing, or by appeals to their reason, however forcible and convincing, is to look for victory from rhetoric opposed by Colt's revolvers. Compelled in fact either to abandon the divine cause for which we have labored so long, or resort to the polls to secure the election of men who favor the Maine Law, we cannot hesitate now, whatever may have been our reluctance hitherto, to avail ourselves of our undoubted right as freemen, and employ the ballot-box for the overthrow of the inveterate foes of the temperance cause.

To this purpose, the present time is singularly propitious. Existing political parties are less cohesive than they have been at any time during the last twenty-five years, and what is particularly fortunate, there are no great issues between them, either as to men or principles, to divert attention or detach support from the important measure we propose to press. There is, beside, a public conviction in its favor, so decided, prevalent and powerful—a conviction not less of its political than of its moral necessity—that in the opinion of the most intelligent and least sanguine men, we cannot fail to command a majority of the legal votes of the State. All that is deemed necessary to insure a memorable triumph, is thorough preparation, in the several counties of the State, to bring to the polls the whole strength of the Temperance cause.

We earnestly recommend, therefore, that in each of these counties a Convention should be held, a complete organization effected, and arrangements made to spread information—through able speakers, the distribution of pertinent tracts, and by means of the local press—before the people, fitted to rouse them to a due perception of the importance of the crisis, and induce them, one and all, to deposit their votes for men in whom they can confide.

Should such men be presented as candidates by either of the parties which divide the State, it will be, of course, unnecessary to nominate others; but in all cases, trusting to nothing except explicit and positive assurances, pledges to support the Maine Law should be invariably exacted; and if pledges should be refused or withheld, not an instant should be lost in calling a Convention and nominating known and tried champions of the measure.

It is not impossible that these parties may defer their nominations to a period so near the election that, though their candidates may be unacceptable to Temperance men, there may be no time to call a convention for the nomination of others. To guard against a contingency of this kind—a contingency that seldom occurs through inadvertence—it should be generally understood, and we earnestly recommend that, if the Whig and Democratic parties do not make their respective nominations before the close of the first week in October, the friends of Temperance will immediately thereafter proceed to nominate a ticket of their own, to be supported by their votes subsequently at the polls, be the nominations of other parties what they may.

We would further and finally recommend, that a Committee shall be appointed in each County, charged with the duty of ascertaining by correspondence the views of candidates for the Legislature, and invested with power, should pledges to support the Maine Law be refused or withheld, or nominations delayed, to call a Convention [illegible] the purpose of selecting candidates from the ranks of Temperance.

These and other measures, suggested by local circumstances, will be found to be important, if not indispensable auxiliaries to success in the campaign which we are about to commence. After all, however, they will avail little, unless the friends of Temperance are, in the coming election, the friends of nothing else. To a man they should feel their personal responsibility for its result, and resolve that no candidate, Whig or Democrat, if unpledged to the Maine Law, shall receive their votes; that any candidate, Whig or Democrat, shall receive their votes, if known to be a friend and advocate of that law. In a word, let every Temperance man carry his principles to the polls; so doing, victory awaits us and the honors of victory. The last and the fatal blow will be given to Intemperance and its abettors, and the shout of the delivered be heard ascending to Heaven.

Friends and fellow citizens, in laying these views before you, we disclaim dictation; with hearts full of devotion to our common cause, we invite your coöperation; and believing that you will appreciate our motives, and commend our zeal, we cordially, and without fear for the result, commit the future of that cause to your sovereign hands.

On behalf of the Executive Committee of the N. Y. State Temperance Society,

EDWARD C. DELAVAN, Pres.

WM. H. BURLEIGH, Cor. Sec.

BRITISH BAPTISTS.

From the "Baptist Manual" for 1853, the Christian Watchman and Reflector gleans the following interesting statistics relative to the Baptists of England, Wales, and Ireland:—

The results of the returns for the year exhibit 35 Associations, embracing 1134 churches. Of these, 1039 report their condition; 851 having had a clear increase of 1840 members; and 188 having suffered a clear decrease of 321 members. This diminution, it is stated, is to be found chiefly, but not wholly, among the Welch churches, and is regarded as a reaction from the large accessions of former years. The net increase of the whole is 1519; an average of about one and a half to each church. Twelve new chapels have been built and dedicated, and five have been enlarged. The "table of settlements" shows a good deal of change in the pastoral office. Sixty-two new pastors have entered upon their relations and labors within one year, and nineteen ministers have died. Of each of these a short and very appropriate biographical sketch is given. This is a feature of this Manual that is worthy of notice. It preserves in a permanent form, a brief outline history of the ministry, and can be referred to in future years as a reliable record.

The societies of a missionary character are the Baptist Mission, with an income of over $90,000; Baptist Home Mission, with receipts amounting to over $20,000; the Baptist Irish Society, with an income of $11,530; General Baptist Mission, with contributions to its treasury of nearly $10,000; Bible Translation Society, with an income of over $7,000. Besides these, there are the Particular Baptist Fund Society, founded in 1717, whose object is the education of ministers, assistance of poor churches, &c., having an income of $12,925; the Baptist Magazine, Bath and New Selection Societies, whose object is the relief of ministers' widows, the support of superannuated ministers, the relief of widows and orphans of ministers and missionaries. The expenditure of these three societies is $410,090. These facts and figures show a commendable liberality in British Baptists, and exhibit a wise distribution of their charities.

The colleges of the realm are six in number—better were it could they be reduced to two, or one. These are Bristol, the oldest, Leicester, Haverfordwest, Horton, Pontypool, and Stepney. The largest number of students is at Horton—only twenty-seven; Leicester has the least number—ten; Stepney has the largest income, being about $8,600.

AN OLD-FASHIONED REVIVAL.—A correspondent of the Baptist Register, who writes from northern Pennsylvania, thus describes an interesting revival now in progress in that region:—

"There is, in the Bridgewater Association, and has been for several months, one of those 'good old-fashioned revivals' which are not of common occurrence in our times. The place of its first appearance is a farming region, not densely populated, where the New Milford church had held up the standard for thirty or forty years. A young minister, Br. N. Callender, had been laboring for two years, but had just accepted a call to raise a church at the new county seat of Laporte, when the power of the awakening Spirit was observed among his congregation. He attended to their wants, and was soon rejoiced to find them new creatures in Christ Jesus. Meanwhile, others had been convicted of sin, and yet others, and thus it has been for six months; without any continuous meetings, without any excitement, the convicting and converting power of God has been exerted upon the hearts of the people. One family would exhort a neighbor's; persons from one neighborhood would introduce the subject of personal piety into another neighborhood; and in this manner over 100 have been added to Baptist churches, besides a few to other churches; many who are converted have as yet joined none, and perhaps hundreds have received serious impressions which may never be effaced. The country for several miles around has been leavened, and only eternity can tell the results. The last I heard from there, the revival was still in progress, and the brother—engaged to another field—was called from day to day to his blessed work in this. It was a joyous Sabbath, last month, when over fifty, (more than the whole membership previously,) were admitted to the church by the hand of fellowship."

The new church for the use of Rev. Mr. Speer, as a missionary to the Chinese population of San Francisco, is about to be commenced. A subscription of some $20,000 has already been secured for it. It is an interesting circumstance, connected with this enterprise, that among the most liberal donors were some of the resident Chinamen.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The following lines were found among other little poetical effusions after their author's decease; and though, from the small estimate in which she held them, she had never shown them to me, they breathe so much of the subdued enthusiasm and fervent love of nature for which she was so well known, that I publish them, although in so doing I may reawaken in some hearts a "rooted sorrow," and evoke

> "A voice that now might well be still."

Those who knew her (and they were many) will require no apology for their insertion in the columns of the "Recorder." All such will be glad to meet with any little effusion from the pen of one who was so much beloved when living, and deeply regretted in her untimely death. They have an additional interest from the fact that the wish expressed in the last four lines was so far from being realized. She was called to "yield her breath" amidst the full bloom of May and womanhood. J. D. B. S.

LINES,

WRITTEN ON SEEING THE FIRST FADING LEAF, SEPT., 1843.

BY CAROLINE B. MAXSON.

I hail thee, mighty Autumn,
  So solemn and sublime—
Most joyfully I hail thee,
  As, on the wings of time,
Thou mak'st thy first appearing,
  Thy mighty conquests spread,
While Summer shrinks, as fearing
  Thou'lt speed it with the dead.

But whence this dreary sadness,
  As I behold to-day
The world's bright robe of gladness
  Withdrawing from the spray?
I know. 'Tis scenes of Autumn
  That memories fresh retain,
To stir the torpid heart,
  And hush my busy brain.
Let Autumn's charms so lovely
  Now cluster round me long;
Autumn again I may not see,
  But thus shall run my song:

Autumn, thou best of favors,
  Thou bring'st us noble thoughts,
Reward'st our faith and labors
  With heavenly blessings fraught.
I love thee, lonely Autumn—
  I love the glorious hue
Thou 'rt spreading o'er the forest—
  This I with rapture view.
I love the crowded umbrage,
  And by and by the dun,
And all the rich and lovely shades
  Thou 'rt spreading 'neath the sun;
I love the fading flowers,
  I love the leafless tree;
So, Autumn, wield thy power,
  My choice thou'lt ever be;
And if disease shall linger,
  O let me yield my breath
When by thy skillful finger
  Thou paint'st the garb of Death.

THE AMERICAN BOARD.—The following statement by Dr. Pomeroy shows a commendable liberality on the part of the supporters of the American Board, and indicates the true doctrine for all missionary organizations to act upon:—

"The receipts of the Board, from all sources, for the year ending July 31st, do not vary much from $315,000. This result has been reached without any extra effort or special appeal. It was indeed stated, that the expenditures of the year would be at least $300,000. As a matter of fact, they have been $310,000; so that only a small surplus remains in the Treasurer's hands. Here is cause for devout thanksgiving on the part of the friends of the Board. But what shall be the mark to be aimed at during the financial year on which we have just entered? Shall it be $325,000, or $350,000? We cannot speak positively at this moment, but we incline to the opinion, that the sum required for a vigorous prosecution of the enterprise, cannot be less than $325,000, and may rise as high as $350,000, and even higher. The true doctrine on the subject is, Advance, Advance! God's hand is moving wonderfully."

A MISSIONARY DEIFIED.—In 1832, Mr. and Mrs. Todd were sent out as missionaries of the American Board to the Tamil people. Mrs. Todd died in 1835, at Devispatan. Rev. Mr. Taylor, of the Madura Mission, being in that place in February last, visited her grave, to see if the monument was in repair. On reaching the spot, what was his concern, to find that lamps are burned, sacrifices made, and prayers offered, to this servant of Christ, and that miracles were commonly reported to have been wrought there! He thought he would put a fence round the grave; but then he considered that this would confirm the notion of its sanctity. He next thought of having the remains removed to the Mission Cemetery at Madura; but this would not enlighten the people. "My conclusion," he says, "was to let it remain, and report the facts to the people of God in America."

NEW EDITION OF THE BIBLE.—Rev. Thomas H. Stockton, an eminent Protestant clergyman, now residing in Baltimore, proposes to issue the sixty-six Books which compose the Bible according to the Received Version in so many different volumes, each containing the text beautifully printed on large, open type, followed by an original dissertation, with explanatory notes and every thing essential to a fair understanding of the sacred text—the whole to form a cabinet or miniature library, which will be more or less costly according to the taste and means of the purchaser—say from $25 to $150 for the whole, according to the richness of binding, &c. The Book of Genesis will first be issued as a specimen; price 50 cents in paper covers, so as to be sent through the Mail. The text is printed separately, so as to be bound apart from the Notes if desired.

TO THE ANNIVERSARIES.—Arrangements have been made with the Rome and Watertown Railroad to take delegates from Rome to Adams Center and back for one fare—tickets to be obtained at the office in Rome after October 3d, and hold good till October 14th. The fare from New York to Rome is $3 26. From Rome to Adams and back about $1 70. Persons leaving New York by steamboat at 6 o'clock Third-day evening, will reach Adams Fourth-day afternoon.—Trains leave Rome for Adams Center at 7 o'clock A. M.; 2.55 and 7.20 P. M.; through in two and a half to three hours.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

A society has been formed in London, "for exploring the ruins of Assyria and Babylonia, with especial reference to biblical illustration," under the patronage of Prince Albert. The plan is to raise £10,000, and commence operations at once in various parts of Mesopotamia; and to sustain necessary activity during three years, £5,000 is to be expended the first year. A committee of twenty-eight noblemen and literati has been formed to carry the design into execution, and there appears to be no doubt of its success.

A correspondent of the Carolina Baptist, speaking of a protracted meeting at Island Creek, says: "Truly, the Lord was with us. The gray-headed fathers, the mothers and the children, together with the most intelligent and influential young men and ladies, were seen flocking home to their Father's house. Thirty-eight happy converts have followed our Lord in baptism, three more by experience, not yet baptized, and three restored. Many more have professed, whom we expect to unite with us at our next meeting."

The Twentieth Annual Commencement at Oberlin, Ohio, recently took place. There have been over 1,000 pupils in the institution during the year. One of the female students was a colored girl, Frances A. Williams, of Cincinnati. Her essay is said to have ranked among the best. The whole number of gentlemen in the college during the year 1852–3 was 561; whole number of ladies 459.

We have just received (says the Bible Society Record,) a donation of $100 from the church of Rev. Mr. Coan, at Hilo, Sandwich Islands, with a letter. Mr. C. says, this is a part of $2,000 which that church has contributed to benevolent objects during the past year, and in the course of which time 400 members have been added to that church. Surely, there is encouragement to labor for the heathen.

Some eighteen years ago, Romanism was the only religion tolerated by law in Texas. Now it has 30 churches, 25 priests, 6 literary institutions, and an estimated population of 30,000; while Protestantism, which eighteen years ago was illegal, has 27,000 communicants, i. e., 12,000 Methodists, 8,000 Baptists, 6,000 Presbyterians, 1,000 Episcopalians, and about 30,000 adherents among the population.

The English Church Missionary Society has a large surplus of funds and a sad deficiency of laborers. It desired to send forth forty new missionaries last year, but could obtain only a small part of them; they now need more than forty for India alone. They pledge themselves to send out "any number of true hearted missionaries, who may appear called of God to the work."

The Independent says that there is a clergyman in this city who has toiled for more than ten years in a hard field, where the soil has not seemed to be very productive. A little time since he proposed to the congregation to take a dismission; and on condition that he was released, he pledged four hundred dollars a year in aid of the society, so long as they retained their present church organization. The proposal and its non-acceptance speaks well for both parties.

Mr. and Mrs. Dr. Bridgman arrived at Shanghai on the 3d of May. About two weeks afterwards the work of translating was resumed in committee by Messrs. Bridgman, Culbertson and McClatchie, the return of Bishop Boone being expected within the present year. "With regard to the rebels in Nanking," he says, "no mortal knows what to expect. But one thing I regard as certain. There will soon, probably very soon, be a call for scores of missionaries."

Bishop Smith, of Kentucky, in his annual address, spoke of the destitution of ministers in his diocese as "absolutely crushing." As a remedy, he proposed that the General Convention should authorize the insertion of a new Suffrage in the Litany, and an additional Collect in the occasional prayers, "that the Lord of the harvest would be pleased to send forth more laborers into his harvest."

An undertaking has been begun in England, in which the coöperation of Americans is solicited. It is to raise the sum of $5,000 for the benefit of the poor persecuted Madiai, who are now in exile, and in want. In England it is proposed to confine the contributions to a penny each.

A London correspondent, who writes under date of August 19, says that the Connectional Fund of the Wesleyan Conference had reached at that date the large sum of £70,000, or some $350,000. The fund is to be employed in relieving the chapel debts of the Wesleyan Methodist churches of Great Britain.

The Christian Watchman states that Miss Martha Whiting, late the accomplished principal of the Charleston Female Seminary, who died at Hingham a few days since, has left between five and six thousand dollars to objects of religious benevolence.

A new Baptist church is about to be formed at Adams Centre, N. Y., by a colony from the old Adams church. The new interest has in progress a house of worship that will cost about four thousand dollars. The old church had only three pastors in forty years.

The Scotch citizens of Boston have made arrangements to bring to this country from Glasgow, Rev. Mr. Muir, one of the most talented and eloquent ministers of the Free Church of Scotland.

Mr. Tufts, of Medford, who gave the site for the Universalist College on Walnut Hill, has made a will giving the institution also two hundred thousand dollars.

Rev. Mr. Kincaid, of the Baptist Burmah mission, writes from Rangoon, under date of March 28, that eighty-four converts had been baptized since the July preceding.

SOUTHERN SUNDAY WORK.—The following is an extract from a letter written by a young man residing at the South, and published in the Independent Democrat, of Concord, N. H.:

"On last Sunday, Mr. —— got ready for church, but his carriage was not ready at the door, which, of course, aroused his Christian indignation. He sent for Henry, the footman, and ordered him to be whipped. Henry expostulated, and endeavored to excuse himself. His master ordered him to put on his coat and follow him to the slave yard, saying that he would teach him to answer back. His wife is also a slave, but hires her time. She was waiting to meet her husband, as usual on Sunday, when his brother came and told her that he was in the slave pen. She went about among her friends, and at last got several gentlemen together who were willing to buy him. They offered the gentleman a thousand dollars for him; but he said he would not sell him here, but ordered the slave trader to sell him in New Orleans. The poor wife is almost broken-hearted about him. His children attend our Sunday school, and are interesting, intelligent children. Mr. —— has sold Henry's brother to a Red River planter; thus parting a whole family, out of pure fiendish revenge upon his helpless slave."

European News.

Ten days later dates from all parts of Europe have been received since our last.

The Eastern question seems to be as far from actual settlement as ever. The Czar had accepted the Vienna propositions on the express condition that the Sultan should make no modification in them, and without any stipulation as to the withdrawal of his troops from the Turkish dominions. The Porte has, however, made some modifications in these proposals, and one or two of them are sufficiently shrewd and important. Now it remains to be seen whether the Czar will allow these changes, or will go to war.

There was nothing politically important stirring in England. The Queen's movements in Dublin occupy the newspaper columns, where it is duly set forth how Ireland is in a feverish state of loyalty, and that the presence of the sovereign dispels those mists of ignorance and prejudice which had arisen at the bid of professional agitators. The Queen had visited the Exhibition two or three times, witnessed a review of eight regiments of troops, and paid a private visit to Mr. Dargan at his house at Anville.

A railroad collision had happened near London, in which the Lord Mayor, the Bishop of Lincoln, and other respectables, were considerably shaken up, but not seriously hurt.

The Cholera was continuing its progress in Northern Europe.

A dispatch from Athens, dated the 26th of August, announces that Thebes has been almost destroyed by an earthquake.

In China the revolution advances triumphantly; two more large cities have been added to its trophies; and there seems not the slightest probability that its forward course will be arrested short of the entire expulsion of the Tartars; and this result promises to be quite speedily attained. The imperial treasury is at its last gasp, and extortion and confiscation suffice to fill it no longer. Even the Tartar troops from the North, who were relied on to save the conservative cause, flee at the approach of the rebels, or fall like cowards on their faces before them, and are put to death. As to the Christianity of the new rulers of the country, there is still the best reason to distrust its orthodoxy, while they seem to contemplate no change in the political system, beyond transferring the power to natives, and making merit and not purchase the ground of promotion. Toward foreigners they are very friendly; Dr. Taylor, an American missionary, who has been at Ching-kiang-foo, was cordially received by Gen. Loo, the officer there in command, entertained with liberal hospitality, and sent rejoicing on his way back to Shanghai. The attempt of the imperialists to retake that important city by the help of foreign vessels, has been signally defeated.

Presuming that our readers will be interested in them, we give the details of news from China. A letter dated Hong Kong, July 7, says:—

The principal news from Shanghai is the failure of the attack made by the imperial forces, aided by their fleet of European rigged vessels, on Chin-Keang-foo, a city distant half a mile from the south bank of the Yang-tze River, and strongly fortified. This city is the key to the whole Chinese Empire, and to effect its capture the Tartar chiefs were resolved to strive their utmost. The Shanghai fleet, consisting of the recently purchased Agnes, Antelope, Dewan, armed respectively with 28, 12 and 12 guns, and 25 lorchas, commenced the attack on Chin-Keang-foo on the 28th of May. The defenders had fully prepared themselves for the struggle by strengthening the defenses, burning down all the suburbs, and mounting heavy cannon. The Shanghai fleet anchored abreast of the city, and opened a very heavy fire, which was returned from the stockades with great spirit. The hights commanding the river were so admirably fortified that they did serious damage to the shipping. The fleet peppered away until all their powder was expended, when they were forced to retreat about a mile and a half below the town. The loss on either side was not great. During the engagement about 6000 imperial troops were encamped within three miles of the city, coolly looking on instead of attacking the forts on the land side. The fleet had returned to Shanghai, heartily disgusted at their want of success.

The Friend of China is of opinion that the fruitless attack on Chin-Kiang-foo decides the fate of the Empire, since the Tartars, with all the foreign aid they are likely to get, have been fairly obliged to give it up. When the British during the war captured Chin-Kiang-foo, and the news of its fall reached the Imperial ears, an overture of peace was at once made. The Hong-Kong Register terms the attack "a Vauxhall kind of bombardment." The Tartar Emperor of China has made a most pitiable application to his subjects for contributions, and his proclamation says that he has no other resource to relieve his bitter distress. To make matters worse for the reigning emperor, intelligence has been received that a revolt had broken out in the Island of Fermosa.

The foreign politicals are doing all in their power to prevent their subjects from visiting the disturbed districts, but the eagerness to gain information is such that all attempts to prevent them are comparatively futile. Dr. Taylor had succeeded in reaching Chin-Keang-foo, and purposed proceeding on to Nanking, but the attack made by the fleet had cut off for a time the communication between the two places, and he was forced to return to Shanghai. Dr. Taylor ascertained that the insurgents observed Saturday as their Sabbath. Mr. Carpenter, an American Baptist [Seventh-day Baptist] had essayed to reach the insurgent camp, but, after reaching about twenty miles beyond Wosung, the refusal of his boatmen to proceed any further had compelled him to relinquish the attempt. Messrs. Muirhead and Wylie, belonging to the London Missionary Society, started in Chinese costume for Nanking, and got as far as Suchau, where they were discovered, lost their false tails, and got hustled by the mob, but were rescued by the officials, who treated them with much care and respect. The Taoutae had complained to the British and American Consuls, but this did not deter two other British subjects, Messrs. Reynolds and Richards, from trying a commercial visit. The Taoutae has compelled their return to Shanghai.

NEW YORK STATE NOMINATIONS.—The Democratic Party held a Convention at Syracuse, last week, to nominate Candidates for the officers to be filled at the forthcoming election. The two branches of the party—called now-a-days the hard-shells and soft-shells—could not agree, and so each nominated a ticket. The "Hards" nominated Geo. W. Clinton for Secretary of State, James E. Cooley for Controller, James T. Brady for Attorney General, Winslow C. Watson for Treasurer, John C. Mather for Canal Commissioner, John D. Fay for Engineer and Surveyor, Miles W. Bennett for State Prison Inspector, Samuel S. Browne for Clerk of Court of Appeals, Charles H. Ruggles and Hiram Denio for Judges of the Court of Appeals. The "Softs" nominated for the same officers respectively, Isaac A. Verplank, Robert Kelly, Martin Grover, Francis Segur, Andrew J. Yates, W. H. Bristol, Wm. C. Dreyer, Albert Edgerton, Charles H. Ruggles and Hiram Denio.

SUMMARY.

Miss Anna DeWolf, the daughter of Mr. DeWolf, of Chicago, Illinois, who was so terribly scalded on the morning of the 8th inst. in consequence of the breaking of the crank-pin of the steamer Bay State, while on her passage from Fall River to this City, died in the New York Hospital from the scalds she received on that occasion. It will be recollected that Mr. DeWolf, with his wife and eight children, who had been sojourning in New England for a term of weeks, were returning to their western home when they met with the fatal occurrence on board the ill-fated boat which resulted the same day in the deaths of his three daughters, Mary, Maria and Charlotte. Anna DeWolf, the eldest daughter, was badly scalded, but hopes were entertained that she would recover, but now we are pained to add her death to the melancholy catalogue.

On the 8th inst. an affray took place near Tibbatt's cross-roads, some ten miles back of Alexandria, in Campbell County, Ky., between William Prichard and Jesse Yelton, which resulted in the death of the former. The parties were both between fifty and sixty years of age, and both farmers in easy circumstances. Mr. Yelton was widely known, having a few years ago been County Judge, and being generally prominent as a citizen. Prichard was famed for his height, being the tallest man in Kentucky, with the exception of the celebrity known as the "Kentucky giant."

Harvard College opens this year with the largest classes ever known at that Institution. The Boston Transcript says: The Freshman class numbers 75, the Sophomore 100, the Junior class 90, and the Senior class 90, making in all 355 under-graduates. The entering class of the Divinity School numbers 7, 4 of whom are graduates of the College. Both of the upper classes have received additions, making the whole number to be 20. The number of students connected with the other professional schools has not been definitely ascertained, but will swell the sum total to about seven hundred.

One of the patients in the Pennsylvania Hospital for the Insane, at Blockley, recently broke out of his apartment and went to the stable of the institution, where he harnessed two horses to a carriage, and drove off tandem. The lunatic found his way to Red Bank, where his real condition was suspected, and he was brought back to the city and restored to the asylum. The unfortunate man was detected when his fare was demanded on board the ferry boat. He answered very promptly, that he paid no fare, as he owned all the property around Red Bank.

The Bridge of the New Hope and Delaware Bridge Company will be sold at Lambertsville, N. J., on Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 3 o'clock P. M. The sale will be made by the Receivers, who for some time past have had the control of the bridge. This bridge spans the Delaware, and connects Lambertsville, in New Jersey, and New Hope, in Pennsylvania, and has heretofore been an important point of communication between the two States.

The steamship Georgia, on her way from New York to Havana, put into Norfolk in distress on the 10th inst., having sprung a leak. The vessel was much damaged—her hurricane-deck, state-rooms, bulk-heads, &c., being cut up for fire-wood—all her wood having been washed away. Many of the passengers lost all their baggage and money. But for the exertions of the passengers the vessel must have foundered.

A dispatch dated Philadelphia, Thursday, Sept. 15, 1853, says: Wm. Spriggs, a fugitive slave, claimed by Dr. John Whitridge, of Baltimore, was arrested here this afternoon by a young man of 18, a son of the celebrated Geo. F. Alberti. A hearing was had before Commissioner Ingraham, when the fugitive acknowledged that he was a slave, and refused to have counsel. A warrant was therefore made out, and the slave started for home with his master.

The Boston Traveler has been informed that the valuable cabinet of many thousand specimens in Comparative Anatomy, Mineralogy, and other sciences, collected in the course of years by that distinguished savant, Professor Agassiz, has been purchased for the University at Cambridge, at the price, as is rumored, of $12,500, the greater part of which, it is said, was obtained by private subscription.

Mr. James C. Forsyth left New York very suddenly in the last steamer for Europe. It is now charged that he had committed forgeries to the amount of $100,000 to $150,000, principally upon his father and father-in-law, and obtained the money from Kingston, Hudson, Albany and New York. On the day that he left he sold $6,000 of paper to brokers, which has since been paid by friends. Mr. F. had always stood high, and in money matters had extensive credit, producing, as occasion required, large amounts of the best securities. Gambling was probably the cause of the delinquency. He owed $3,000 to one of the most notorious villains of the "profession" in this City.

The Missouri River has opened for itself a new outlet into the Mississippi. On Saturday week it cut a new mouth or debouche into the Mississippi, across the point of land lying about half a mile above where it has run of late years. It now strikes the Mississippi in a direction which is likely to prevent the washing of the Illinois or eastern shore to any injurious extent. At the last accounts, two steamers had passed through the new chute, and this may now be regarded as the main channel of the Missouri.

Its competitor reached the eighth heat after the other had nearly completed the ninth of ten miles, and was withdrawn and died in less than an hour.

DIED,

In Milton, Wisconsin, October 2, 1852, Mrs. ELIZABETH FLINT, aged 57 years and 8 months. Sister Flint embraced religion when about sixteen years old. It being inconvenient to meet with Seventh-day Baptists, she became a member of the First-day Baptist Church, (but kept the Sabbath,) where she retained her standing about four years; then removing to Allegany Co., N. Y., she united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, where she remained until the constitution of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Scio, where she and a few others united to worship the God of the Sabbath in the beauty of holiness. There she maintained a pious and godly life, until she was removed by the hand of God to his blest abode, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest. In her death the church lost a worthy and exemplary member, and her husband and children lost a loving and devoted companion and a tender and kind mother.

At his residence in Amity, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 9th day of September, 1853, JOSEPH FLINT, aged 61 years and two months, of bilious cholic, after an illness of 24 hours. Brother Flint was a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Scio, with which he had been connected ever since the church was constituted. The community feel that they have met with an irreparable loss, for he was a man who had the confidence of all who knew him. The funeral services were conducted by Eld. Jared Kenyon; discourse from Prov. 10: 7—"The memory of the just is blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot." His remains were followed to the grave by a large concourse of people, where he will remain until he shall be raised in the likeness of his divine Master, to hail him in triumph. C. R.

In Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., Sept. 9th, Mr. SAMUEL BABCOCK, aged 78 years. Mr. B. was a native of Hopkinton, R. I., and in early life settled in Brookfield, with his father's family, of which the greater part have gone to their final resting place. In early life he became connected with the Seventh-day Baptist Church, of which he was a member at the time of his death. He has left a widow, two brothers, and one sister, to lament their loss.

In Bridgewater, Oneida Co., N. Y., July 24th, Mrs. MARY BLIVEN, widow of Capt. Ethel Bliven. Mrs. Bliven was a native of Westerly, R. I., and a descendant of the venerable Elder Thomas Hiscox, an early pastor of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, with which church Mrs. B. became a member when young, and remained a member thereof until death.

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 11th inst., Mrs. MARTHA LEWIS, wife of Pardon Lewis, aged 47 years. She suffered very much in her sickness, but bore it with Christian fortitude. Sister L. was a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, and left with her friends and brethren a good hope that death to her was gain.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

Miscellaneous.

Get up before the Sun.

Get up before the sun, my lads,
Get up before the sun!
This snoozing in a feather bed
Is what should not be done.
Between sunrise and breakfast, lads,
Rise, breathe the morning air,
'Twill make you look so bright, my lads,
'Twill make you look so fair.

Get up before the sun, my lads,
Shake off your sloth—arouse!
You lose the greatest luxury
That life has, if you drowse
Between sunrise and breakfast, lads;
Arise, then, do not lose
The key of health and happiness,
By lying in a snooze.

Get up before the sun, my lads,
And in the garden hoe,
Or feeds the pigs, or milk the cows,
Or take the scythe and mow;
'Twill give you buoyant spirits, lads,
Give vigor to your frame—
Then rise before the sun, my lads,
And these rich blessings claim.

Newly-Invented Steamship.

In this age of daring, unexpected and impetous advancement, belief in the value of discoveries and inventions yet untried may safely be large, judging by the vast array of analogies and experiences, of which we are constantly put in possession. The so-called impossible passage of the Atlantic by steam in fifteen days, has been rendered still more wonderful by the reduction of the time by degrees to twelve and finally to nine days and a fraction. But this reduction is evidently but the precursor of continued diminution of the period required, and therefore we are not much surprised to learn that one of the most eminent of living engineers, William Norris, of Philadelphia, has commenced constructing in this city a steam vessel, to be ready to sail somewhere about next February, and which will, in the opinion of the inventor, be able to perform a voyage to Europe, habitually and securely, within six days, besides possessing various other advantages over ordinary steamers.

This vessel is now building at Green Point, and is of the following dimensions: Length on deck 225 feet; depth of hold 21 feet; diameter of paddle-wheels 36 feet; beam amidships 37 feet; draft of water 6½ feet; displacement 750 tuns; power 1,200 horses; accommodations for 80 passengers.

The builders guarantee that she will make the voyage between New York and England within six days in the winter season. William Norris, Civil and Mechanical Engineer, and John W. Griffiths, Naval Architect, are the constructors and patentees. They claim the following advantages in their improvements:

1. A perfect security against fire or water.
2. Less risk to life, and greater comfort to passengers.

The boilers will be placed within walls of iron, with iron beams over the same.

Air chambers, of sufficient sustaining capacity, will extend the whole length of the ship.

The sudden shocks of head and beam seas, to which all ships of the present construction are liable, are obviated by these improvements, while the gentle undulating motion, always maintained, will tend to prevent sea-sickness, and at the same time keep the decks dry except from spray.

The full power of the engine will be reserved for combatting heavy gales, while ships of the present construction are compelled to slacken their steam as the gale increases in severity. These new improvements enable more steam to be applied, the harder the gale blows.

The machinery of this ship will consist of one walking-beam engine with two tubular boilers, all of the most improved construction, but without any thing new in their principles. The power of the engine, in proportion to the size and draft of water will be very great, about five times as great, we believe, as that of the steamers of the Cunard line. In an ordinary vessel, such power cannot be applied, as it would tear the hull to pieces. In the present case, however, it is made practicable by the peculiar internal structure as well as by the novelty of the model.

As will be seen by the figures given above, the floor of the vessel is unusually flat, and its draft of water exceedingly small. At the same time the bow is unusually sharp. In fact, the model is the result at once of a great deal of practical experience, as well as of laborious and careful mathematical calculations, and it is believed that its lines and form are such as to produce the least possible resistance in passing through the water. Here, then, we have the grounds for the estimate that an average speed of twenty miles an hour will be attained in storm as well as calm:

1. Sharpness of bow, perfection of curves, and light draft and buoyancy.
2. Enormous power of engine.

The daily consumption of coal will be about 90 tuns, and the stock for a passage about 300; no freight is to be taken. The vessel is named the William Norris. She will be ready for launching by the 1st of December. Her boilers and engine are building at Secor's. She will carry no masts, but will be arranged with jury-masts to rig in case of necessity. Pasturing Meadows.

A great many farmers make it a practice to turn their whole stock into meadows as soon as the bottoms have got a good start, and frequently before, if crowded for the want of feed. It is an impoverishing process, materially and entirely wrong. Meadows, however, well laid down, receive nothing except from the process of top dressing, which does not prevail in this country, but are continually shorn to the very earth of all their produce, none of which is ever returned in any shape, until it is again broken up. Now, is not this as great a draft on the bank as the deposits will warrant, without depleting by pasturing? The droppings of the animals are no compensation, with the exception of sheep, and do more injury than good, if not very thoroughly distributed in the spring.

The way to extirpate and thoroughly destroy Canada thistles, and all noxious and vicious pests and weeds, is to keep the leaves cut down—leaving the roots bare and without the ability to increase or extend, and wherein does the process vary? Instead of the hoe or scythe, the sharp noses and keen scissors of the hungry animals keep down every spear of fresh vegetation. Every new leaf that expands on shrub, tree or plant has a new root, fibre and spongioles, and if continually despoiled of its leaves, the provision for next year's produce is materially curtailed. The cutting of rowen, or after-math—every mouthful taken by an animal—lessens its ability to produce the next crop.

Farmers are continually complaining that their meadows run out; the timothy and clover disappear, and foul grasses usurp their places, and this must be the inevitable result of a constant clipping and feeding system. This effect is not so sensibly felt in a wheat-growing country, where a constant rotation is necessary, and no land fit for plowing is allowed to lay long in permanent meadow; yet in all countries there is more or less land not adapted to wheat, that should remain in meadow, and may be kept in good heart as such for twenty or forty years, by proper management.

Timothy grass is a perennial, long-enduring grass on moderately dry land—a little liable to be thrown out and killed on wet and heavy land. It is of the nature of wheat, increasing only by offsets, and the seed magnified appears exactly like the wheat kernel, and makes a flour hardly distinguishable in taste or composition. If the offsets are eaten off at their first starting after the hay clip, the whole stock is weakened, and perhaps is winter-killed. Clover is equally affected, and even June grass, and the whole class of plants that increase by snake-heads, or runners, are rendered weak, and he next year's production feeble and light.

No one can have his cake and eat it too; all take out and no put back, soon empties the meal chest. The result is as palpable as law suits. [Rural New Yorker.

The Mammoth Tree.

Our readers are aware, (says a San Francisco paper,) that this wonderful production of nature, which has drawn so many travelers to witness its vast dimensions, has been felled to the ground, and the bark stripped from it, for the length of fifty feet from the base. We learn that it is now in Stockton, and will be brought to this city, to be exhibited for a short time prior to being shipped to the Atlantic States. The bark, which is from one to two feet in thickness, has been taken off in sections, so that it can be placed, relatively in its original position, and thus give the beholder a just idea of the gigantic dimensions of the tree. So placed, it will occupy a space of about thirty feet in diameter, or ninety feet in circumference, and fifty feet in height. A piece of the wood will be shown, which has been cut out from the tree across the whole diameter. We are told that this piece of wood shows a vestige of bark near the middle, and that this bark was evidently charred many centuries ago, when the tree was comparatively a sapling.

A curious circumstance is related, connected with the felling of this wonderful tree. It was accomplished by first boring holes through the body with long augurs, worked by machinery, and afterward sawing from one to the other. Of course, as the sawing drew to a close, the workmen were on the alert to notice the first sign of toppling; but none came; the tree was so straight and evenly balanced on all sides, that it retained its upright position after it had been sawed through. Wedges were then forced in, and a breeze happening to spring up, over went the monster, with a crash which was heard for miles around.

Newly-Patented Printing Apparatus.

The late London journals contain descriptions of a printing apparatus newly-invented by a Major Beniowski, for which a patent has been obtained, and which a joint stock company intends to put in operation.

The primary feature of the scheme is the use of the logotypes, the peculiarity of which is that, besides being composed of double, treble, and even quintuple combinations of letters, the character to be printed is stamped at the bottom of the type, and so presented first to the eye of the compositor, and consequently a person not trained in what is technically termed composing can soon with great facility single out the letter he requires. Logotypes, so far from being novel, were used in printing one newspaper at least toward the close of the last century. The reason assigned for their abolition was the immense space required for their proper arrangement, the frames employed being ten times as long as the ordinary existing case. To remedy this, Major Beniowski has devised what is termed "the authoritor," composed of 1,650 compartments rising above each other, and all placed within the reach of a person sitting opposite them in a chair. Here the single and combined letters are arranged in convenient alphabetical order; and, instead of being selected with the hand, are picked up with metal tweezers. Whatever difficulties may attend the practical every-day working of the machinery, there can be no doubt that the composing of the logotypes is an operation of great rapidity. It is part of the system that females and children can soon be taught to compose. A young lady composed five and a half lines from a newspaper, taken up at random, within three minutes, which is at the rate of 110 lines per hour, a speed far above that which is attainable under the established system, and which, if the other parts of the plan correspond with it, must have the effect of immensely reducing the cost of composition. The distribution of the type, after being used, is performed by means, first, of drawers into which it has to be dropped, and then by being slid down the composing apparatus in separate grooves.

The second feature of the scheme is a printing machine having the following novel features: The types are imposed on the interior surface of a cylinder, and therefore cannot fall out by their own gravity, nor can they be driven off by the centrifugal force, be the angular and the perimetral velocity ever so great. The feeding and receiving boards, the distributing, inking and impression rollers, like all the other organs of this machine, are in the interior of a cylinder, and therefore the whole occupies but one-third of the space it would otherwise require. The distance between the feeding and receiving boards is reduced to a few inches. The receiving and depositing of the printed sheets is performed automatically, and therefore the number of attendants is reduced in proportion. The machine is simple in construction, but its productiveness may be increased to an unprecedented extent. A machine constructed for the purpose of throwing off about 20,000 impressions per hour of a paper the largest size in existence would occupy no more than a common four-feeder. Such machinery, combined with a double composition, would produce 40,000 impressions per hour.

Another feature is found in inking-rollers, permanently elastic, not subject to atmospheric influences, and which may be driven with any velocity. They are filled with compressed air, and those in use were exposed during a period of upwards of twelve months to dry and wet weather, and also to temperatures varying from summer heat to below zero, without ever wanting more than a few minutes to make them dry. R. Green, Esq., M. D., in his report on the machinery generally, observes: "The inflated India rubber rollers are absolute perfection. No other substance in nature possesses the perfect and permanent elasticity of vulcanized India rubber and compressed air; and being formed without a seam, their durability appears to be almost without bounds."

Another Cavern.

The Greylock Sentinel, of August 12, gives an account of the late discovery of a large cavern in the side of the mountain near North Adams, in Berkshire County, Mass. The exploring party found the mouth of the cave wholly filled up, but an hour's digging revealed a cavity large enough to admit the passage of one man's body. A rock which was the chief obstruction, having been removed by blasting, they began the descent. A sharp turn to the left brought them to a broad, flat rock, which extended down some twenty feet, ending with a standing place for two, and below yawned the jaws of a measureless pit. On throwing down a lighted torch into the cavity, it was evident that a room of considerable extent was below. A small rope was made fast around the body of one of the party, when he was lowered into the abyss, landing safely on the bottom, a distance of about twenty-five feet. After a partial exploration of this room, finding that there were numerous passages leading from it in various directions, and that there was yet another room, which, as the shades of evening were gathering about the outer world, it would not be convenient to explore, they concluded to abandon further researches until the following morning.

Tuesday morning the cave was revisited by the glimpses of the lantern and candles. Prepared with a large, stout rope, the descent was effected with much greater facility than before. The first room it was decided to christen the "Reception Room;" the cave itself, by the same authority, it was decided should be called "Caddy's Cave," in honor of one of the party. The Reception Room was found to measure in three different ways, 50 feet, 44 feet and 36 feet respectively. It is very irregularly shaped, and its hight was estimated to vary all the way from 10 to 50 feet. Water dripped continually from almost all portions of the roof, and a small stream of water traversed the south-western section, which the entire company pronounced to be the coolest, purest, sweetest water ever tasted. There is at the foot of the mountain, by the roadside, a spring of excellent water, flowing from the cave; for it is said by those who have formerly visited this room, that upon oiling the water there, the water in the spring would in a short time present a similar appearance. From the Reception Room narrow passages lead off in various directions. One passage, termed "Drizzly Avenue," 24 feet in length, through which the explorers had to crawl serpent fashion, terminated in a cavity about the size of a common well, but which, at the depth of 34 feet, is some 15 feet in diameter. This was christened the "Devil's Den." From this another passage led upward growing wider as it extended; but it was left unexplored, on account of the danger from loose and crumbling rocks, which gave way at every step.

Another passage, it is said, has since been discovered, leading to another room still larger than the Reception Room. Much remains yet to be explored, and it is likely to be a place of considerable resort. The rust on the clothes of the party testified to the abundance of iron ore in the cave.

The History of one Glass of Wine.

We find in Harper's Magazine an interesting history of the birth, parentage, and rise to power of the present Emperor of France. Included in that article, we also find the history of "one glass of wine," as follows:—

"But there is another party who repudiate the claims of the Bourbons, and espouse the cause of the Orleans branch of the family. The Duke of Orleans, the eldest son of King Louis Phillippe, was the inheritor of whatever rights his royal father could transmit. He was a noble young man—physically and intellectually noble. His generous qualities had rendered him universally popular. One morning he invited a few companions to breakfast with him, as he was about to take his departure from Paris to join his regiment. In the conviviality of the hour he drank a little too much wine. He did not become intoxicated. He was not in any respect a dissipated man. His character was lofty and noble. But in that joyous hour, he drank a glass too much. He slightly lost the balance of his body, and of his mind. Bidding adieu to his companions, he entered his carriage. But for that extra glass of wine, he would have kept his seat. He leaped from the carriage. But for that extra glass, he would have alighted on his feet. His head first struck the pavement. Senseless and bleeding, he was taken into a beer shop, and died. That extra glass of wine overthrew the Orleans dynasty, confiscated their property of one hundred millions of dollars, and sent the whole family into exile."

Singular and Successful Operation.—Patrick McGregor, of Armstrong county, a soldier in the late Mexican war, during one of the battles, received a wound from a musket ball in the right leg, above the ankle. The ball was supposed to have glanced from the bone, and the wound healed, but occasional pain was felt by Mr. McGregor, and during the last six months it became unbearable. All the means used by his medical attendants failed to relieve it; his system began to suffer, and his health to decline.

A short time since, he came to Pittsburgh to have the leg amputated by Dr. A. G. Walter, should it prove necessary. Dr. W. suspected that the ball had entered the bone, which had closed over it, and that, owing to the cause not having been ascertained, the remedies employed had been ineffectual. Acting on this supposition, he divided the integuments over the bone, and removed a portion of it by the trephine, when he found the ball, and a portion of the soldier's pantaloons, imbedded in its substance. They were removed, and all pain ceased. The patient now has the perfect use of his leg, and can walk about as well as ever.

Railroad for Broadway.

Among the many ingenious plans for a street railway, adapted to economize space, (in that respect peculiary fitted for Broadway,) is one by a William Deitz, a colored man of Albany, who has just taken the necessary steps to patent the same. We give a slight sketch of the plan:—

In the center of the street, say within six feet of each other, are two iron tracks laid down in the usual manner, upon which it is intended to run two lines of cars, each, say, four feet wide, and of any convenient length, one line up on one rail, the other line down on the other rail. The wheels of the cars are placed under the center lines of these frames, ranging with each other. The balance of the cars is preserved by another set of wheels placed in line above the first set and which run under, or between elevated rails placed fifteen to twenty feet above the ground rails. These elevated rails are supported upon cross-bearings and framing which connect a double row of pillars about twelve feet apart, that is six feet from the center of the street, leaving fourteen feet between the pillars and the curbstone. The cars are to be propelled by an endless rope extending from Union Square to the Bowling Green, and running over the upper set of wheels. One of the most ingenious arrangements of this plan is that by which the rope is supported overhead and connected or disconnected with the cars at will. The rope is supported at intervals by pairs of shives or pulleys, placed exactly opposite to each other, in prolongation of their axes and about an inch apart, each of the shives in form that of the one-half of a grooved-pulley, the pulley being cut asunder through the middle of its groove; these pulleys run each on its own axle, which is secured to a standard rising from the frame that supports the upper rails. From the car there rises an upright post which carries on its upper end a thin stem, capable of passing between the pullies just described, and supporting a grip of peculiar construction, which by a rod and spring can be made to grip the moving rope or let it go instantly, so as to permit the car to stop and take in or leave passengers.

Capture of an Escaped Convict.

About four weeks ago a convict, named James Dunn, escaped in an ingenious manner from the Sing Sing Prison. He made his way under water from the prison to a point about a mile distant, where he went on shore and could not afterward be found by the officers of the prison or the authorities. He did this by means of a water-proof pipe, the lower end of which he held in his mouth, while the upper end was joined to a small bag of air, which looked like a duck, and floated upon the surface of the water. By this means he breathed while he made his way slowly under water. Efforts were made by the prison officers to capture him, but without avail.

Learning that a number of prisoners were aware of the escape of Dunn, and were planning for their own escape, the officers of the prison resorted to a ruse to give the impression that he was caught, and was killed in the attempt to take him. A funeral took place at the prison, and a coffin filled with shavings, said to contain Dunn's body, was interred, for the purpose of intimidating the prisoners. Citizens of Sing Sing hearing of this, had the Coroner held an investigation, which brought the deception to light.

Information was recently gained at the prison that Dunn had been seen in the upper part of New York. Capt. Andrews, Warden of the Prison, C. C. Childs, Jr., Clerk of the Prison, and Keepers Washburn and Baker, came to the city, and having ascertained the residence of Dunn's relatives, watched the house. At eight o'clock on Saturday morning, finding the doors locked, they burst them in to search for Dunn. Meantime Dunn leaped from the window of the second story and ran, but was overtaken about two blocks distant from this house. He had a pistol in his hand when captured. He was taken back to Sing Sing, to finish his term of imprisonment.

Economy in High Places.

The London correspondent of the Sunday Times states that Prince Albert is building a palatian residence at Balmoral, and goes on to speak of his income and expense, as follows:—

"He brought no money to England, it is true; but recollect, that from Feb. 10, 1840, Prince Albert has had an annuity of £30,000—that as field marshal he receives £16 5s. per day extra—that he has the pay and emoluments of two colonelcies—that he is a ranger of Windsor Park, and that every appointment being heaped upon him, which he decently can hold, his actual income is over £50,000 a year, out of which, having bed and board with his wife, his actual expenditure is not $4,000 a year. In fact, his savings already exceed a half a million sterling, a very small portion of which he retains in England. A part is invested in the public securities of Holland, part is in the French rentes, part in the United States securities, and I dare say that the house of the Messrs. Baring, in New York, could tell you (but they won't) how much they have invested, in real property in New York, for Albert and Victoria. She, it is well known, expects some great European revolution which will drive her into exile, and has well laid up for a rainy day, whenever the smash comes! That was what Louis Phillippe did, and see the fruits of it—his family, out of of France, have as much money as they care to spend."

A Tale of Slavery.

It will be remembered by some of our citizens, (says the Cleveland True Democrat,) that about two or three months since a colored man visited our city for the pupose of obtaining money enough to buy his child that was held as a slave in Kentucky. Through the generosity of J. H. Smith and his congregation, with some added by private individuals, the amount was raised, and the happy negro went on his way rejoicing. Now comes the saddest part of the tale. When the poor colored man arrived at his home, he immediately handed the money, to obtain which had cost him so much labor, to a friend, who started immediately for Kentucky. Arriving there, the money was laid before the master by the gentleman, when, to the utter astonishment of the latter, the slaveholder burst into a fiendish laugh, and said, "he'd be damned if he would sell the boy at any price." He refused all terms, laughed at all exhortations, and finally ordered the gentleman who wished to purchase the boy out of the house. He left sorrowfully, knowing how his bad success would affect the father, who was in a delirium of joy at the idea of seeing his long lost son. Imagine the feelings of that man when it was communicated to him that his boy was lost forever. Our informant tells us that he said not a word, nor wept; but any one familiar with a human heart could tell what agony that poor black man was in. He seems to have grown ten years older, and it is feared, unless some change take place, he will soon die. His life seems worse than death, and he loudly prays for the latter to come.

Statistics of a Monster Hotel.—During the year ending on the 1st inst., the consumption of several articles of provisions in the Metropolitan Hotel were: Beef, 418,000 lbs.; lamb and mutton, 3,500 head; veal 150 head; fish and lobster, 110,000 lbs.; oysters and clams, 626,000; poultry and game, 171,000 head; ham and pork, 91,000 lbs.; butter and cheese, 65,000 lbs.; eggs, 780,000; milk and cream, 204,000 quarts; flour and corn meal, 2,800 bbls.; fruits and vegetables, value, $20,000; brandy and other liquors, 6,322 gallons; champagne, 21,160 bottles; sherry, Madeira, &c., 22,912 bottles; claret and white wines, 18,942 bottles. This is independent of malt liquors, cordials, cooking wines, &c. The gross cash receipts for the year were $500,000. This is independent of wear and tear, which is by no means a small item. The cost of heating the house and the gas consumed, during the year, was $14,000. Croton water rent, $1,000.

VARIETY.

The ship Star of the East recently sailed from New York having on board two steam-engines and boilers, and two steamboats, taken out in sections, with several machinists and others, to put the same up when she reaches her destination at Peru. They are intended for the River Amazon, and will be the "pioneers" in steam navigation on that splendid river. They were built under the superintendence of Dr. Joseph Whitman, who represents the Chilian Government, with whom he has contracted to deliver the boats complete.

As Alexander the Great was marching in pomp at the head of his mighty army, he passed where Diogenes in his tub was very intently engaged in examining, arranging, and reärranging a heap of bones. The conqueror, causing his hosts to halt, thus spoke, "What doest thou here, Diogenes?" The cynic replied, "I have here the bones of thy father Philip, from which I am trying to separate those of his lowest servant; but for the life of me I cannot determine 'which is which.'"

The following odd inscription was copied from the back of a one dollar bank bill of the Bedford Commercial Bank: "i Present this Bill to Eldr Cole hoping it will help him a Long through the Country & to Preach the gospell to all Both Ritch & Poore, the high & the Lofty & the Loe With ut regard to sect or age & hoping that they might adhear to his preaching and thear by Escape from misra and woe."

"What do you use to make yourself look delicate?" said one young woman, with an eruption on her face, to another, who looked like the departed. "Why," said she, "some times I eat slate pencils and chalk, and then for a change drink vinegar and chew green tea. When these fail, I lace tighter and wear the thinnest shoes I can buy."

A copy of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, directed to an Ohio post-office, has been returned with the following announcement on the wrapper: "Dear Sir these does not belong to the place thare is no call for them may be they belong to—this is four that has sent yours P M have them properly directed."

M. Marcel, who has just written a work on the study of language, argues that the reiterated perusal of a book is to be preferred to writing, as a means of recollection. Johnson and Gibbon thought thus. The latter says, "I must agree with Dr. Johnson, that what is twice read is commonly better remembered than what is transcribed."

Thirty-five years ago (says a Western man) we came to Ohio, and in so doing passed through what was then called the "four mile woods," this side of Buffalo. It then took a whole day to pass through this four mile mud-hole. In an excursion the other day, we passed over the same ground in five minutes. Thirty-five years ago, it took us forty-two days to travel six hundred miles, and now the journey is made in less than that many hours.

The task set to children should be moderate. Over exertion is hurtful, both physically and intellectually, and even morally. But it is of the utmost importance that they should be made to fulfill all their tasks correctly and punctually. This will train them for an exact conscientious discharge of their duties in after life.

One half the unhappiness we have in this life, exists because of the much sensitiveness and a morbid disposition which allows trifles to weigh heavily on our minds. A trifling loss or inconvenience often causes more annoyance than a much greater sorrow.

The effect of lead pipe upon water is again attracting the attention of the scientific. Dr. Horatio Adams, of Waltham, in a report on the subject, says that "less than one-hundredth part of a grain of lead per gallon of water, has been known to cause death."

There is an editor in North Carolina with seven bullets in his body—received in duels and street encounters. His paper ought to be called the Bulletin, and contain all "leaded" matter.

When a Kentucky judge, some years since, was asked by an attorney upon some strange ruling, "Is that law, your honor?" he replied, "If the court understand herself, and she think she do, it are!"

No one can ever become learned except by his own application. Modes and opportunities of education may facilitate our progress; but, on the whole, our attainments must be resolved into our own diligence.

If you mean to make your side of the argument appear plausible, do not prejudice people against what you think truth, by your passionate manner of defending it.

The celebrated Dugald Stewart remarks, that the power of setting readers to thinking is one of the most unequivocal marks of original genius.

SABBATARIAN MISSIONARY FIELD.

The propriety of extending the operations of the Sabbatarian Missionary Enterprise, has been discussed, at some length, in the Recorder, recently, and probably will become a prominent topic at the Anniversary of the Missionary Society, to be holden at Adams, N. Y., early in the ensuing month; and as circumstances, entirely beyond my own control, will render it impracticable for the writer to be present on that deeply interesting occasion, I cheerfully comply with a request to embody my views on the subject, for publication, in advance of that convention.

It is my abiding conviction, that no people, church, or society of Christians, since the days of divine inspiration, have had so much cause to congratulate themselves upon their pioneer efforts to establish a foreign mission, or so much cause for devout gratitude to the Ruler of Heaven and Earth, for the blessings shed upon these feeble efforts, made in his name, as have the Seventh-day Baptists—the last denomination to enter the field, yet so signally blessed as almost to justify the appropriation to themselves of the Scriptural passage, "the first shall be last, and the last first"—a success so signal as not only to flush our own bosoms, but even to extort the admiration and praises of numberless good men of other denominations; who, knowing something, by years of intimate connection with the management of missions, the trials of the missionary, and the difficulties of sustaining them in the field of their labor, attest our labor and success nobly.

This very success, or, in other words, this signal blessing from above, rolls, afresh, great and weighty obligations upon all Sabbatarians, to renew their efforts to advance the cause of Zion, at home and abroad; and that especially at this eventful period of overturnings in the largest heathen empire in the world. Emphatically, "a door has been opened unto us," in China. Who can fail to trace the leadings of our precious Saviour, in putting into the hearts of our Sabbatarian brethren, a few years since, to send out their light to a dark, heathen Empire, as John was sent into the wilderness as the forerunner of the glorious advent about to be ushered into a benighted world. If any set of men on earth have any cause for self-congratulation—for heart-rejoicing—it is those friends of missions, in our midst, who in their feebleness, and under so many forebodings of failure and overwhelming discouragements, urged and urged, wept and prayed, prayed and wept, and urged and urged again, this matter on our people. All praise to God alone; but all honor, appropriate honor, I say from my heart, to those who projected and carried into completion the establishment of a mission in China. Millions shall be raised up to call them blessed. Emphatically, "a door has been opened unto us;" and we, with the glorious effulgence of light and success around us, would not only be pusilanimously derelict in duty, but criminally culpable, in not embracing the opportunity thus afforded unto us, and improving the unmistakable indications of Divine Providence in this momentous matter.

It is unquestionably a momentous period to Sabbatarians. A political irruption, an overturning of the ancient regimè, and an opening of that vast Empire, to free intercourse and Christian civilization, has started up like a blazing meteor, and probably ere this has been perfectly consummated in "the Middle Kingdom"—the spot of all others in the East, to influence, and eventually to control public sentiment throughout the Asiatic continent—an eruption of a force as sudden as the descent of an avalanche in the Alps, and as overwhelming in its astounding velocity; carrying with it, not wonder and destruction, but wonder and admiration. Wonder, that an isolated body of professing Christians have existed, almost unknown, in the center of heathenism for so long a period; and admiration that they should come forward in the strength of the true God, the Lord God Almighty, bearing the Bible as their banner or sheet-anchor; and still more surprising, and more worthy of admiration, to us, that they should be observers of the true Sabbath—the Sabbath of the Lord our God. It comes so suddenly, and in such bright phases, as not only to surpass our most glittering dreams, but even to outstrip all the most fanciful pencilings of "Fairy Land Tales," and the gorgeous imagery of the "Arabian Nights Entertainment;" which in our youth have held us spell-bound, days and nights, and weeks and months. Never since the days of the Advent of the Messiah, and the chivalric heroism of the Crusaders, has there been a period of combining circumstances, so calculated to elevate poetic aspirations in forwarding religious interests, as now conspire to affect our higher nature. It is a period, above all others, that calls upon us, particularly, "to spend and be spent in our Master's cause."

Brethren, are you awake to your position, or are you slumbering on as the sluggard, crying, "a little more sleep, a little more slumber?" Have you seen, by the eye of faith, the redemption of your souls on Calvary, and still sleep on? Or have you stretched out your hand in some stinted measure, to aid in rolling on the Gospel Car, but now tire under the work? I say unto you, there is now no time to halt—that time has gone by. He who has put his hand to the mission plough, or the mission cause, cannot look back—you must be with the missions or against them—there is no neutral, no indifferent ground. The Rubicon has been passed, and our march is onward, onward, onward! If any hesitated or halted in the onset, they can halt no longer. I candidly confess that I hesitated, qualifiedly, in the onset; not, however, respecting my own feelings, but out of regard to others; because I was placed in a position, by the partiality of some of my good friends, which made my acts impliedly binding on others, when I had no authority to pledge "material aid," corresponding to the influence my vote in the Board of the Missionary Society would involve; but I have never hesitated an instant, since the mission was determined upon, and hope not to halt in strengthening the hands of the Society, with my voice, with my pen, with my heart, and with my substance, as the Lord may prosper me. I not only say, On, on, on, with the mission in China, and with reinforcements to that mission, but my voice is, likewise, for Palestine, and for California and Oregon.

If any thing—any hidden emotion in the regenerate heart—is calculated to wake up the strongest enthusiasm of the human breast, and fire it with new emotion and fresh sacrifices, it is the restoration of Palestine to Christian possession. Palestine! the natal place, the mission field, of the blessed Saviour, with Gethsemane and Calvary, the scenes of the passion and the sufferings of the bleeding Lamb, and the desecrated sepulcher of the Crucified Redeemer—who, who, that has a Christian heart, would not strive, and strive unceasingly, to restore these sacred resorts to Christian hands, and to sow the good seed of the blessed Gospel in the hearts of the profane multitude who now inhabit the hills and plains of Judea? What effort on the part of man should it not call forth? What effort has it not commanded, in times past? But what was not accomplished by the spear and sabre, may be achieved with the Word of God; and while the Spirit of the Most High has stirred the hearts of Sabbatarians to go in and conquer the Holy City, with the sword of the Spirit, who will not hold up both hands to plant the Cross—the pure, ungarbled, unadulterated Gospel—in Palestine? Who? who? who?

Think you, brethren, that we have done our work in starting a mission in China? I tell you that we had better never known anything of a missionary spirit, than to stop there. You have done much for a small denomination; but you have much more to do. I have said, that you have done much. How much? Have any of you felt any poorer for what you have given to the mission? It is a lean soul, indeed, that that kind of feeling will not fatten. Have you given your last mite, as did the poor widow? If so, you have done something. If not, you have something more to do, as a true disciple. If the evident indications of the Master are clearly and distinctly leading to Palestine, or any where else, we must not stop short of yielding our all, to follow him. Of a truth, we do not possess a true missionary interest until we can do as the poor widow did—yield her whole living; and we can have no proper estimate of the value of missionary love and missionary devotion, until we can drink of the deep fountains of Christian love and Christian devotion, welling up in the bosoms of Leonard Dober, and Tobias Leopold, who, warmed with philanthropy scarcely ever paralleled, and with a concern for poor perishing souls not manifested since the days of the Apostle Paul, offered themselves to go unto the poor negro slaves of the West Indies, and to labor for their salvation, even should it be required to sell themselves into slavery to reach them and to teach them Christ crucified, as they worked together in the deep, miry savannahs.

Brethren, if we are not called upon to make such sacrifices as Dober and Leopold, we can contribute to its consummation in some measure; and, in forwarding that ennobling cause, enrich our spirits tenfold. It is an axiom verified by scripture, that the more a man does for the furtherance of the Gospel, the greater the sacrifices he makes for that holy cause, the greater his soul becomes enriched. If you do not see it in your own experience, it is because you have not contributed enough to feel it. Others see it—others read it—and if you do not feel it, you must buy another pair of glasses. There can be no better investment to enrich the soul; it is like the poor woman's investment, in the Old Testament, who succored and sustained the Prophet Elijah two years with a handful of meal and a little oil in her cruse. Who among us has felt poorer for ministering to, and in sustaining our devoted, hard-working missionaries in China? My own trifling pittance to that great cause, I regard as my best investment—an investment which is the last I should think of parting with in this world.

Brethren, we are still too much in the low grounds. It behooves us to mount as on wings, and, forgetting ourselves—our comforts and our ease—reach forward, and forward, and forward. Christian benevolence is an expansive principle, ever seeking new opportunities for more enlarged usefulness: once manifested, by love divine, it awakens greater and greater desires to benefit poor perishing souls. The mission to China has begotten a deep and abiding interest for Palestine. Like produces like; and when once the spirit of missions is implanted in the breast of the disciples of the lowly Jesus, it germinates, and germinates, until, like the mustard seed in the New Testament, it grows into a tree which overshadows the whole earth, or, like unto the leaven hid in three measures of meal, it leaveneth the whole lump. We have planted the seed—we have hid the leaven—we must nurture them, we must protect them, until they have accomplished the end whereunto they were designed. We have commenced our work, but we must not look to find it finished, until those figures are consummated. Nay, we shall not have begun, until we have flourishing missions in China, in Palestine, and on the Pacific border of our wide-spread Republic. Sabbatarians awake to your duty! Who, among us, can sit down listlessly, and dream his work done, while the cry from the Tea Gardens and the Bible-bannered fields of China, calls to us to come over to the work of the Lord! Who, among us, can slumber when the cooing of the lone Dove is wooing us to the valley of Artos, in Palestine? and who can fold his arms when the harvest is ripening in the white fields of Oregon and the yellow plains of California? Shall we still resist the Spirit of Missions, knocking and knocking for new missions in China, and for missions in Palestine, Oregon and California? God forbid!

Brethren, we have doubted, but we must doubt no more—doubting, now, is not only culpable, but criminal, after such signal blessings having been bestowed on our feeble efforts. We must cast our bread upon the waters, by faith, and it will return unto us, even if it be after many days. We do it trusting our Lord God, for he is a covenant-keeping God, and has already rewarded us in our efforts much beyond our reluctant trust. No mission ever set on foot, in the Annals of Missions, has been more blessed, or promises better things, than our Mission in the "Celestial Empire." But should it fail, in the consummation of all we desire, it has, already, rendered a work a thousand times, nay, ten thousand times worth all the money, time, and anxiety that has been expended, in the simple protest of our beloved missionaries against the Jesuitical chicanery of commingling the Sabbath and the first day of the week, in the translation of the Scriptures into the Chinese language, under one common term, "Ceremony-worship day"—one of the most contemptible tricks of legerdemain I have ever heard or read of among the lowest order of jugglers or mountebanks. Yes, brethren, if our mission, by a mysterious providence, should be overruled, and all our bright anticipations of good prove fallacious, you have already accomplished enough to resuscitate another on its ruins—enough to encourage, enough to cheer you, under another hard, up-hill work. Hands to the work, briskly, and who can tell what great results may, through your instrumentality, be accomplished for the cause of truth!

Could I dwell on the sublime anticipations we may look to witness from that work of love so auspiciously begun, I should extend my article, already double the length I designed, far beyond all bounds for a weekly print. I therefore turn to a concluding remark. Should all our fondest, our brightest anticipations of our Eastern mission be realized, what would it amount to, were numbers beyond all calculation converted to God, through his word, and embrace our views of divine truth and Gospel duty, when, in the course of things, already of almost daily occurrence, the intercourse between China and our Western shores shall bring Sabbatarian converts to our borders, who shall find no true Sabbath respected—no Sabbath Church established there? Will not the unsophisticated mind of the heathen convert shrink back instinctively, and imagine that he has been imposed upon? How can it be otherwise, when he does not find anything after the fashion he had been taught by the Teachers we have sent unto them? It then behooves us to "lengthen our cords, and strengthen our stakes"—to push on the domestic mission to the shores of the Pacific, to meet the China converts with an open Bethel; otherwise we shall have to take shame and confusion to ourselves—nay, I feel that shame and confusion already mantling on my cheek. I could never endure the reproach of a China convert, under such circumstances. I should choke with mortification. Then, brethren, push on your labor of love—your conquests for the cause of truth. Push on from West to East, and from East to West, until we can say, at least, that the great luminary of day never ceases to burnish the dome of a Sabbatarian temple. W. M. F.

ROMAN CATHOLIC MARTYRS IN CHINA.

The Paris Univers publishes the following document, which is given as a letter (dated Shanghai) from M. Maresea, "Apostolical Administrator" at Nanking. It is possible that the story may be founded on fact. The followers of the Chinese leader, who claims a Divine mission, may have mistaken the worshipers in a chapel adorned with crucifixes and other images for idolaters; and there is but too much reason to believe that they regard the injunction laid upon the first Hebrew invaders of Palestine, to exterminate idolaters, as binding upon themselves. Still, it must be confessed that the communication has the air of M. Maresca's having made the most of his materials:—

The insurgents arrived on the 8th of March before the walls of the town of Nanking, and established their camp in twenty-eight divisions. They dug mines under the walls and filled them with gunpowder, and on the 19th partially blew them up, together with the eastern gate. Immediately after, a signal was given, and they rushed, some to the breach and others to the wall, with an impetuosity which alarmed the defenders. In their first attack they made themselves masters of the town. The Mandarins, who were not able to escape, were seized and put to death. On the 20th of March the insurgents spread through the town and carried everywhere terror and death. A venerable old man, chief of the Christians, was killed in his house with his eldest son; his second son was grievously wounded, the third was carried off captive, and the youngest ran away. On the same day four other Christians fell in the melee. On the 21st of March the family Tseu, the wealthiest and most distinguished among the Christians, were driven from their house, which the insurgents required for their chiefs; and thirty-one members of this family were confined in a neighboring house, and were there burned to death. Two young men belonging to the same family, aged seventeen and eighteen, who were absent when their relatives were burned, have just arrived at Shanghai, after having begged their way—a distance of from seventy to eighty leagues. Five other members of the same family were also absent at the execution of the thirty-one, but it is not known where they have gone, nor what has become of them. All that belonged to the Christian community of Nanking Church, ornaments, money, and papers, were deposited with the family Tseu, and consequently are all entirely lost.

The same day, several persons entered the Chapel of the town where the Christians were assembled, and reciting the prayer of the holy week. They forbade prayers on the knees, and wanted the Christians to recite, seated, the new prayer of Tien-Fou. The Christians replied that they were Catholics, and did not know any other Religion. It was notified to them, that if, within three days, they did not decide on obeying, they would all be decapitated. On the 24th of March some wretches entered the Chapel, to do violence to some young Christian women; but they were soon obliged to leave, and since then there have been no attacks of the kind. In the afternoon a new summons was made to adore Tien-Fou; a new refusal was given by the Christians; and new menaces followed. On the 25th of March the Christians were adoring the Cross, according to the custom, on Good Friday. The insurgents entered all at once, crying and menacing; they broke the crucifix, and then wished to have their prayer recited—at the same time presenting the Christians with books in which it is written. A catechist took a religious book, the "Explanation of the Commands of God," and presented it to one of the Chiefs. He hastily examined it, and returned it, saying, "Your religion is a good one, ours is not to be compared to it; but the new Emperor has given his orders, and you must obey them or die." After summonses, which were repeated in vain, the soldiers seized the Christians and tied their hands behind their backs. The women and children exhorted the men to suffer with a good heart for their faith. They were bound and ill-treated in their turn. All being thus bound, the men were told that they would be conveyed before the tribunal of the Emperor to hear their sentence; the women and children followed them, and all went gaily. When they arrived at the tribunal, they were kept for some time in the outer rooms, and then some officers presented themselves and told them, on the part of the Emperor, that, as they would not obey, they were all condemned to death, and were to be executed at the Western Gate. They were sent off to the place of execution; but at the door of the tribunal an old man, who was unable to walk, was beheaded. The others arrived together at the designated place—they were about one hundred in number. New demands were made upon them to do as they had been desired, but they constantly replied, "We are Christians!" Many threats were made, but no one was executed. Towards the evening all were brought back to the town, and conveyed to a great store, which was formerly the church of Nanking. They there passed the night with their hands bound, and some were attached to columns. One succeeded in unbinding himself and in escaping. The day after new threats were made, and some blows were given. On Easter day all expected to die. Some officers entered the place, and asked if they would recite the prayer. Some said, "You should kill them all, for they will not obey!" but another answered, "No, for in that case they would go to heaven, and have what they desire; while we would be guilty of sin!" However, all the Christians remained firm and yielded nothing. Some women especially, and even some children, cried, "Kill us all, that we may be martyrs and go to heaven!" Some of the soldiers, despairing of being able to subdue the courage of the women, and no doubt not having orders to kill them, opened the doors of the store house, and forced them to leave with their children. They all went to the chapel, where they have since remained with the children; they are between 70 and 80 in number. The men remained in the store with their hands more tightly bound than on the first day. On the 28th March some young men, fatigued with suffering, and dreading new torments, persuaded themselves that they might recite the famous prayer, because it contains nothing contrary to the dogmas of our holy religion. After having protested that they intended to remain Catholics, 22 recited the prayer, and were immediately unbound; but the others declared that they would die rather than recite it before they knew that it was good; and some of them, in consequence, were cruelly beaten. Since then, those who wavered have felt greatly humiliated, and regret that they did not imitate the firmness of their brethren and the courage of the women and children. Whilst the women and children remained in the chapel, without a single man to assist or protect them, the men were ordered to serve the insurgents, either as soldiers or laborers. Ten of them who were taken to fight against Tseu-Kiang took advantage of an obscure night to leave their ranks and run away. They have come here to recount to us what they witnessed. It was on the 14th of April that they succeeded in escaping. Since their departure from Nanking, they have heard say that the insurgents have sent a good many women and children out of the town. The bridge of the great canal is said to have given way beneath the crowd, and more than a thousand persons are said to have been drowned. We are not aware whether any Christians left on that occasion. We have also received news from Yang-Tcheu. On the 1st of April the rebels entered the town without meeting with any resistance. However, they committed the same horrors as at Nanking, and the Christians were not spared. They took the officers of the chapel, bound them, and carried them off with their families. They wanted all of them to recite the prayer of Tien-Fou. Thereupon two chatechists stepped forward and clearly explained our dogmas and usages. As a punishment for this it was ordered that three hundred blows should be given to one and five hundred to the other. It is not yet known if they have been able to survive this cruel flagellation and other bad treatment to which they were subjected. On the whole, out of six hundred Christians at Nanking, Yang-Tcheu and Tseu-Kiang, fifty have been slain or burned to death, and several have been bound and beaten. Most of them have lost all they had, and remain captives, exposed to all sorts of dangers for the soul of the body."

LETTER FROM PALESTINE.

Agreeable to our promise last week, we give below the material part of another letter from Mrs. Minor in Palestine, to her son in this country. We copy from the Christian Observer.

PLAINS OF SHARON, near Jaffa,
June 18th, 1853.

MY BELOVED SON,—In behalf of all our little family, I sit down to relate to you our progress since my last letter to you from Jerusalem, the last of May, just before moving here. You can understand, from experience, the difficulties and bustle attendant on boxing up, and packing on camels, tools, household stuff, &c., and descending the rough mountain pass to the Plains of Sharon. Beside our own family, all on donkeys, muleteers, and camel-drivers, we were accompanied by our two Hebrews, (who have engaged to labor with us,) with their baggage; one with his family, and the other leaving his wife and children in Jerusalem until we get a little established. Altogether, we formed quite an oriental cavalcade, which, at our stoppings for rest and water by the way, forcibly reminded us of similar scenes in Old Testament history.

We left our kind friends, Dr. Barclay and family, with the most grateful sense of their Christian regard and assistance, during our three months sojourn under their roof a little season which we shall long remember as a Bethel in our pilgrimage way.

We set out on the 1st of June, and on the 2d arrived safely at our house, north of Jaffa, at 9 o'clock, A. M. The camels had preceded us in the night, and we found them unladened, Abdallah (our Arab helper) and our three German friends taking care. The Arabs living near were sweeping the plastered floors, &c., carrying in burdens, so that before night we were comfortably fixed, and sat down to our first meal with happy and grateful hearts.

Next morning, early, the venerable President of the Jews of Jaffa, (who acts as Father and Judge of his people, as in Judges,) came and made the warmest professions of regard, offering to advise and assist us in every way, in his experience. We have since been at his house, and he has become a frequent and familiar visitor. It seems that the story of [illegible] widely spread among all classes; and here in Jaffa, as has been the case among the Jews in Jerusalem, we find that our late persecutions by Meshullam, and the English Consul and his friends, have aroused their sympathies in our favor, and given them a confidence in us and our object, that nothing else could have so soon secured.

After the Sabbath, the President accompanied us to his Be-Arrah, (or garden plantation,) and again (as I wrote particularly in my last letter) entreated us to take it, and use it for our object, offering it still lower—at 3,000 piasters for five years, or 6,000 for ten years! We found it in excellent order—fine fruit trees, five years old, planted on one half, the rest for vegetables and grain. He has a fine well, with good machinery, and a lower story, well-arched, with stabling and storage, ready for a house above, which he promises to have built at two months' notice, and rent that for 400 or 500 piasters per annum, including the use of three strong mules and a donkey for water, to be kept good.

We have given to our two Hebrew friends rooms in one wing of our house, with freedom of the terraces and court; and they act and express themselves like birds uncaged. One wrote to his friends that "it was like Eden." The water pours through the large front room, in a channel, plastered through the middle of the floor, with a constant murmuring sound, as it falls into the reservoir outside, under the windows. A grape-vine, loaded with grapes, covers our highest terraces, commanding a beautiful view of Jaffa in the distance, a forest of palms and orange groves, and the harbor and sea, towards Beirut, where we can see the steamers arrive and depart. Miss Williams exclaims, "Could a greater change be imagined, than what we have passed through, and suffered, the last year, and this quiet retreat!" My dear child, I need not tell you how our hearts were filled with thankful joy and peace, and what a season of blessing we enjoyed, the first night, when we all knelt, and dedicated the house, our work, and ourselves, afresh and forever to Him who has thus far preserved and delivered us from all our afflictions.

To our great surprise, we found the constant sea-breeze so cool that the thermometer stood and ranged some eight degrees lower than on Mt. Zion, in the house. It has been from 70 to 80—rarely 80—degrees at noon.

As soon as the first Sabbath was over, the spades, and hoes, and seeds, were unpacked, and work commenced immediately. It being so late in the season, we were obliged only to plant accordingly such vegetables as we had proved best for the hot months. Abdallah's joy, and consequence, and exertion, in showing his proficiency, &c., and helping the Hebrews, would have delighted your heart; and they, in turn, strive to do their best, and have, thus far, been very willing, active and useful. On Tuesday, the soil having been prepared and watered, we put in salad, radishes, early white corn, Tuscarora, Lima, and French (white) beans, cucumbers, cantelope and melons, which were all up on the fourth day afterwards! The soil is very rich and light, somewhat sandy, and easily worked. We have continued planting every day since, and hope to finish next week. We lost some of our best seeds, by leaving them partly grown in Artas; mostly those needed for fall and winter planting. Perhaps you can send us another supply, as we will enclose a list of the most needful. We have made a rule to be out by sunrise, at which time it is very cool, and remain at least three hours—this is for the unaccustomed—and then return at half-past three o'clock in the afternoon, and work till evening. But we have such a fine breeze, that they all transcend the rule. We desire that the Jews should not endanger their health, never having before been exposed to exercise in the sun, and that, by degrees, they may become inured to and in love with their new work.

Thus far, they are very enthusiastic—and we are obliged to refuse many applications. Yesterday a poor man came, who had walked all the way from Jerusalem. We were much pained at his despairing looks, and earnest plea, when we were obliged to tell him it was not possible to receive him. After he had had food and rest, we gave him a dollar to help him back, which was all that we could do. Several intelligent men in Jaffa have offered themselves, and we must still hope that these examples and appeals will not always be in vain, but that Christians of every name will soon arouse, and give Israel the helping hand to reclaim his own land!

There is plenty of land in this neighborhood to be obtained, by lease or purchase, at a very reasonable rate. Wheat and Indian corn and potatoes give the best returns, and all these can be raised in autumn, winter, and spring, without watering.

Last week we met a large number of respectable Jews, at the President's house, mostly heads (or fathers) of families, who wish that their children might have a school, where they may learn to read and write, and speak English, and the girls to learn needle-work, and other civilized arts. If we could open a school in the city of Jaffa—as little children cannot come to our house so far—we might have any number of children at once. By what we have suffered, we have learned something more and more of the many kindnesses in Israel's way—of the many bandages bound around his mental and moral vision from infancy; and our desire, and love, and faith, are only increased by the difficulties we have met, and we are still more certain than ever before, that this simple plan of interesting, and occupying, and aiding him in cultivating his own fair heritage—with all the necessary inlets of a wider love and civilization, and change in circumstances and effort—is the forerunning preparation of the fallow-ground of his soul for that work promised by Jeremiah and Ezekiel, when the Lord himself will give him "a new heart, and a new spirit," and "the veil shall be removed" forever. With this prospect and faith, why not teach English reading to the rising sons of Abraham, who are so soon to be actors here? * * * * *

[illegible] greatly [illegible] of Eld. J.'s coming; but will he not bring one good farmer with him? We should think it indispensable. The President's place would be a fine opportunity to risk only a small capital to begin with. We took courage to stay, and begin anew, hoping some more efficient and wealthy laborers would come and take the field. We shall be glad to have them work in their own way, and have no desire to influence their mode of operations. If any should come this year, they are welcome to our house, until they can look round, and secure a situation favorable to them. We are well informed as to where and how land can be had, and we have the Arabic, Hebrew, German and Spanish languages in our household, for communication in business. Several places near us are now for sale and rent. If Elder J.'s friends would take the President's garden, and will send 3,000 piasters in advance, he will secure them before the Consul here, and have the house built by the time they arrive; or they can live with us until he can build it after their arrival.

There are many mulberry trees already planted near Jaffa, and some think the silk business will be one of the best—a large field of young trees, 10 rods from us, is for sale low. Others think that cotton will yield the most profit; Consul Smith is having large quantities planted, some two hours distant.

The longer we stay, the more we are in love with this delightful climate. My own health, I think, was scarcely ever so good in my life—much better than it has been for many years. Since coming here, I am in the garden early and late, and do not suffer greatly from fatigue. * * * *

I find that there are many little incidental expenses in keeping up such an effort—to keep favor and peace with all the different claims of government and society—as Americans—as Christians, and benevolent persons, much is expected from us. While I have been writing this last page, some five or six Turkish dignitaries—one an agent from the Pasha—have come to see us, and all the chairs must be carried up to the top of the house—under the grape-vine on the top of the second story. We have no pipes to present, but must give a cup of coffee to all, and a kind mar-salaama. The Pasha's agent gave strict charge to Abdallah, (our trusty Arab,) to guard our house well. We are so far out, all warn us of danger, and think it very wrong that we have not even the show of a gun. They say the Arabs are very wild here; though they will not hurt us—they are very great thieves. I think half their warnings are to make us believe ourselves much obliged to them for their protection, and that we may be inclined to make them a backsheesh, (a present,) of a few hundred piasters. The great Shieck of Jaffa has been to see us several times—very friendly; but warns us to keep good watch. We give them kind words, and divide our seeds with them—as most of the rich have their gardens. They are much pleased with their tools, having never seen such. It makes our hearts glad, when we see here and there a patch of Indian corn, and a few sweet potatoes, growing as a curiosity, to think we have been the humble instruments of bringing both to this land. If we succeed, we hope to introduce American tools here, through merchants in Jaffa, who send goods to all parts of the interior of this land. * * *

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 29, 1853.

TURKEY.

It was was about the middle of the seventh century, or twelve hundred years ago, that the Arabians, who had become powerful under Mahomet and the Califs, and had conquered Phoenicia, Judea, Syria, Egypt, and many other countries, penetrated through Asia Minor into Thrace, and attacked Constantinople for several successive years by sea. Constantinople was at that time the seat of the Eastern Roman Empire, and the sovereigns of the Empire were called Christians. These Christian sovereigns, however, were not remarkable for the exercise of that charity which suffereth long and is kind; nor did they, in the exercise of their power in religious matters, evince much of the spirit of Him who has compassion upon the ignorant and upon them that are out of the way. They had become haughty and intolerant. They had learned to persecute, and such detestable enormities prevailed under them, as rendered the very name of Christianity odious to many.

God "ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors." Ps. 7: 13. It is always a righteous thing with him to recompense tribulations to them that trouble his people. 2 Thess. 1: 6. And if governments will play this part, they may expect that their time of visitation will come sooner or later. When the Arabians knocked at the gates of Constantinople, and filled the throne with fear, it was but a premonition of what God was preparing for an empire which, though boasting in the name of Christian, was a burlesque and a scandal to the name.

But the time for the triumph of Mahometanism on European soil had not yet come. The transgressors were not yet come to the full, and the crescent was not to displace the cross till some eight hundred years after. At length, on the ever memorable 29th of May, 1453, the Turks took the capital, and the Arabian imposture became the established religion of the land.

Four hundred years have now passed since the banner of the Prophet first waved triumphantly over the dome of St. Sophia. In the first heat of the conqueror's fury, some two thousand Christians were put to the sword. An enthusiast had prophesied that the Turks, after entering the city, would pursue the Romans as far as the column of Constantine, in the square before St. Sophia, but that here would terminate their calamities; that an angel would descend from heaven, with a sword in his hand, and deliver the empire. Confiding in this prophecy, multitudes took refuge in that sacred building, notwithstanding they had but just before abhorred it as a profane and [illegible]. But the angel did not come. The doors were broken open, and in the common captivity which followed, "the ranks of society," says Gibbon, "were confounded; the ties of nature were cut asunder; and the inexorable soldier was careless of the father's groans, the tears of the mother, and the lamentations of the children." No place could protect the persons or property of the Greeks. More than sixty thousand of this devoted people were exchanged or sold, according to the caprice or interest of their captors, and dispersed in servitude through the provinces of the Ottoman Empire.

But what has been the general character of Ottoman rule in Europe? If the Greek Emperors were haughty, and persecuted such as dared to vary from the prescribed standard of orthodoxy, much more has this been the case with the Sultans of Turkey. Probably no more oppressive government than the Ottoman has existed on European soil. God's people never found protection under it, and only since the humbling of its pride by other powers, has it afforded any sort of tolerance to missionary effort within its limits. "Infidel" and "Christian dog" were the mildest epithets that a Turk condescended to employ towards the disciple of Jesus, while the rigors of government shut up all avenues to religious freedom. Whatever concessions have been made to Christianity by the Ottoman, have been extorted; they have never been given willingly, nor would they have been granted at all, but that the rise of Russia, and the progress of Europe generally, compelled some abandonment of the oppressive and depressing policy which had so long been pursued.

But the day of Ottoman rule in Europe is well nigh closed. In view of what seems likely to be the next succeeding event, namely, Russian supremacy, one scarcely knows whether to regret it or not. Bible Christianity has nothing to hope for from the Czar. He is the sworn foe of all and every form of religion, which tends to awaken in men a sense of their God-given rights. Neither religion, nor education, nor civilization, has any thing to hope from the extension of Russian domain. A cloud of darkness, thick and heavy, looms over any and every spot where the victories of the Autocrat are achieved. Nevertheless, God is in the cloud, and we firmly believe that out of the convulsion which would follow, light and order would arise, and a happy day would dawn upon the crushed and priest-ridden countries of the old world.

The Room where Chalmers died.—Rev. S. I. Prime, in a letter to the New York Observer, thus describes the residence of the late Dr. Chalmers, and the room where he died:

"More sacred far, to my mind, was the room in which Chalmers was found one morning in the sleep of death. I visited it while in Edinburgh. The Doctor's brother, a gentleman strongly resembling him, resides in the house adjoining. He received me and my friends with great courtesy, and invited us to walk over to the house in which the great theologian lived and died. He led us to the study, to the library, to the drawing-room; showed us a marble bust of Chalmers, which he said was a perfect likeness; and then in silence he opened a door—and we stood in a room where the couch and the furniture told us in an instant that here was

"The chamber where the good man met his fate,
Privileged beyond the common walks of life,
Quite on the verge of heaven."

It stands as it was when the body was borne away from it to its present chamber in a beautiful cemetery near the city. Morning-side, the name the Doctor gave to his residence, looks out on the Pentland Hills, and rests in quiet beauty—a sweet spot for the calm abode of one who was never out of the world's conflicts while he lived, but who needed such a place as this in which to refresh his spirit, and gird himself for the field. He was fond of his garden, and his brother walked with us through its flowers and shrubbery, which the same hand planted that wrote the Astronomical Discourses and the Lectures on the Romans."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Steamer on the Clyde.

Glasgow, September 9th, 1853

Our history of the Sunday Steamer on the Clyde is not yet complete. To the Remonstrance of the Established Presbytery, a Reply, of upwards of two columns of a newspaper, by the Proprietors, signed by Andrew Patton, Chairman, was published towards the end of last month. Having "examined the Scriptures," they say, they "find therein no authority for the Sabbath observance" which the Presbytery seek to impose upon them. They question, or deny, that the Sabbath remained obligatory when the Mosaic law was abolished, as the Presbytery teach. But if the Sabbath be still in force, as contained in the Fourth Commandment, they ask, "upon what authority" the church have "even changed the Sabbath day from the seventh to the first day of the week." "To be consistent," say these Proprietors, "the seventh, not the first day of the week, should be the one insisted upon for observance." "Christ," they again say, "therefore, neither excepted the Fourth Commandment from abrogation, nor varied the day of its observance; and we look in vain in the writings of the Apostles for proofs of their action in this matter." "Throughout the New Testament there is not the slightest evidence of the retention of the Jewish Sabbath as a part of the newly promulgated Christian system, or the substitution of the first day of the week as the day of observance. We look in vain for a command, either on the part of Christ or His Apostles, that the first day of the week should be kept holy in place of the seventh, or that the first day should be set apart in commemoration of the resurrection, and devoted exclusively to prayer and preaching, or that no manner of work should be performed on that day." They therefore intimate their design of continuing to sail the Emperor as they have done. Thus it is, that the Church, having taught the people to trample upon God's command, the traditions of the Church are now also made to share the same fate.

At the meeting of the Presbytery, two days ago, instead of a reply to the arguments of the Proprietors, the Rev. Mr. Gillan escaped from the task, saying, "the Presbytery would require to know with whom they were dealing, whether they were men of good standing in society," before they debated with them. But the Presbytery did not seem to consider this inquiry necessary before presenting the Remonstrance, the reply to which suggests the necessity of this personal ordeal. The reverend gentleman moved that the Presbytery appoint a committee "to draw up a pastoral address, and to send a memorial to the Lord Provost and Magistrates, and the River Trustees, upon the subject."

On the same day, the Free Church Presbytery likewise had the matter under their consideration, when Dr. Brown, the convener of their Sunday Observance Committee, said, "he had some hope, (but he also had fears,) that public opinion might put down that enormous evil." Dr. Smyth's distinct conviction was, "that they should go directly to the civil magistrate, and require him, on the authority of God's law, to interfere for the protection of the Lord's day." It would be easy indeed to find the law which sanctifies the Lord's day, but not so easy to find in God's Word the law which sanctifies that alone for which Dr. Smyth is concerned. Mr. Gibson, also, was for application to civil government; and although he did not know whether the law could be made available against the various forms of Sunday desecration, to a number of which he referred, "the question should at least be tried, for we could not be worse than we were, even if the law were found insufficient."

When tried, we expect that the church will find civil government little disposed to grant them much aid in the case. No allusion was made in these discussions, if the speakers were aware, to the fact, that the day previous the subject of the Sunday sailing of the Emperor was again before the River Trustees—and that there, at least, matters were made worse for the Church's adopted day, in so far as that it was openly promulgated, that they had consulted their legal adviser, both at the present time and twenty years ago, when a similar proposal had been brought before the Trust, and were informed that they had no legal power to prevent the sailing of a steamer or other vessel from the harbor. They might withdraw their officers from giving attendance, but as the Trust considered that this would lead to accidents and disturbance, they directed the officers to attend. The Greenock Harbor Trustees had a meeting on the same day, and in a discussion in reference to the Emperor, their clerk also said they had no power to prevent the vessel from arriving or departure; but to intimate their displeasure, they refused to sanction the attendance of their officers. But this will not prevent the Sunday pleasure sailing. The Emperor is advertised for Sunday first.

OUR MISSIONS—CHINA AND PALESTINE.

The interests of our China Mission, under the peculiar circumstances of the country, will be sensibly felt, we trust, at the coming Anniversaries. Though the revolution is in many respects interesting and wonderful, giving hope to Christians, and awakening enthusiasm in many minds, at the idea so novel as that of a vast Empire becoming christianized by such unlooked-for means, and that its Christianity has some appearance of having originated from the Bible, at least not under the influence of Jesuitic Romanism, still it must be remembered, that it is propagated by the sword, and enforced by absolute power, and must in many respects lack that lovely aspect which it has in evangelical Christian countries, and will call for immense labor, (should the insurgents succeed,) in cultivating a proper knowledge of the principles and the spirit of Bible religion, over so immense a field. And it must be remembered, that in the stations of our American and European missions, extreme suffering may yet be experienced. As the war sweeps over the land, and in some of its features a sanguinary war, life and property will be in peril, and considerable time must elapse before the strife will cease. It may become our duty to strengthen that mission with additional laborers, or it may be that we may learn with sorrow that the mission already established is broken up. These things demand our anxious concern, and the prayers of God's people should be fervently offered for the cause of pure Christianity in China, and the peace and welfare of those engaged in the field. But we hope the increasing interest for china will not abate the ardor of the friends of the Palestine Mission; for if our enthusiasm is awakened by the circumstances attending China, it will also impart an increased interest for Palestine.

We are all astonished at the display of Christian knowledge and zeal among the insurgents of China, and we ask, and others ask, by whom was the gospel introduced into that country? And no one has been able to answer the question. Surely, no missionaries of any Protestant denomination, in America or in Europe, have been instrumental in introducing it, since reports from all established missions are spread before the world, and nothing has been known of the efforts which have produced the mighty revolution. Again, it has not the features of any known Christian denomination; and there is no Protestant church that maintains the seventh-day Sabbath, or that is not infected, more or less, with Romanism, except the Seventh-day Baptist church, and certainly we have had nothing to do with it. The utter ignorance of the Christian world with respect to its origin, occasioned a presumption that it was the work of Jesuits; but this is now refuted. Whence, then, was the work? This query has been raised, and still remains unanswered. I will suggest, that the gospl has been carried into China by Jewish converts, who were the fruit of the labors of the indefatigable Wolff, and other converted Jews, who for the last quarter of a century have been preaching the gospel in the interior of Asia among the Jews, and especially in Thibet and adjacent countries within the Chinese Empire: and they have uniformly, among the Jews, sustained the ten commandments of the decalogue, and the Sabbath as unchanged, as I am informed; and the peculiarities of some of the matters communicated from the insurgents, indicates a better knowledge of the Old than of the New Testament. This conclusion should strengthen the ardor for inculcating the gospel among the Jews, as they may, and probably will, be made the most efficient missionaries in the world; and by converting the Jews to Christianity, we will enlist the mightiest instruments in the converting of the world, that can be procured; and the astonishing movements in China should become the motive for entering with all our might into the Jewish mission, as God will no doubt use that people ultimately to carry forward the triumph of the stone cut from the mountain, and cause it to become a mountain, and fill the whole earth, and bring the tottering image of despotism and heathenism thundeing to the ground.

Methodist Church South.—The Western Christian Advocate says that the total membership of the Methodist Church South consists, in round numbers, of whites, 400,000; of colored, 150,000; total, 550,000. The South Carolina conference has the largest membership, consisting of 33,000 white members and 41,000 colored; the Georgia conference has the largest number of white members—49,000—but has only 18,000 colored, less than one-half the colored members of the South Carolina conference. The Pacific conference, which has 294 members, is the least in numbers on the Pacific coast, and Florida, 5,500 white and 3,500 colored members, the least lying immediately on the Atlantic coast. The Indian Mission, East Texas, and the Western Virginia conference, are each less in number than the Florida conference.

Moravian Missions.—At a recent meeting held in Sheffield, England, on behalf of the Moravians, the following statement was made:

"The Moravians on the Continent of Europe and America did not number above 20,000 souls, yet they had gathered, through their missionaries, not less than 70,000 persons into Christian congregations in foreign lands. At Labrador, nearly the whole of the natives had been christianized. At Surinam, out of 13 missionaries, 11 had died of the yellow fever; yet there was no lack of laborers for God. During the last eleven years, the congregations at Surinam had risen from 10,000 to 17,000 persons. It might be estimated that one fourth were communicants. In the West Indies, the congregations numbered about 40,000 persons, principally negroes, and there were upwards of 2,000 children in their schools. Two training schools had been established for the education of native teachers. It was seldom that one taught in their schools left the path of rectitude. The Moravians have 70 missionary stations and 286 missionaries in the world, and these are sustained for the trifling expense of about $60,000."

THE METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.

At a meeting of the Rock River Conference, recently held in Chicago, statements were made by the agents of the New York and Cincinnati branches of the Methodist Book Concern, setting forth their condition and the extent of their business; from which a Chicago paper gleans the following interesting statistics:—

The total assets of the New York establishment amount to the very large sum of $706,733 05. Its real estate in New York, buildings, and the requisite materials for printing, binding, &c., amounts to $243,947 83. It has invested in public stocks some $49,500. Its present cash assets are given at $16,947. Its books and sheet stock on hand are worth $176,130 35. There is due in notes and accounts, $210,207 10. The liabilities are only $29,858 56, which, deducted from total assets, leaves the actual capital of the concern $676,874 49. The sales during the past year amounted to $182,757 80. The sum received for periodicals for the same time was $69,890 77, making a total of $252,648 57.

The Cincinnati establishment has a capital of $242,802 69. The value of its real estate is put down at $65,000. Its stock on hand, materials, &c., are estimated at $60,853. Its cash and stock amount to $22,044 15. Its notes and accounts amount to $111,417 26. The liabilities are $16,530 91, leaving as the net capital of the concern, $226,271 78. The profits for the year ending March 31st, 1853, were $10,968 25.

In addition to these two immense establishments, the General Conference has published, much under its immediate supervision, a paper at Pittsburg, at Buffalo, at Chicago; a Sunday School Journal with an immense circulation, a Quarterly Review, and two Monthlies.

For the various papers thus issued, as well as for all the books published, each traveling and local preacher of the denomination is an authorized agent, and the Conference expects a commendable activity on the part of each in procuring subscribers for its various hebdomadals, monthlies, and quarterly, and in disposing of its books. In the sale of the latter, a small per centage is allowed, for the purpose of covering cost of transportation, and the loss of an occasional bad debt. By this system it happens that every Methodist within the bounds of the different conferences, whether the denizen of a city, village, or even the most remote backwoods settlement, can supply himself with any book published by the General Conference. These books are not altogether of a denominational character. Standard historical and poetical works, and biographies of men remarkable for piety, benevolence, &c., &c., comprise by no means an inconsiderable share of the books which are thus sown broadcast over the country.

At the last session of the General Conference, that body determined to make Chicago a base for newspaper and book operations. Accordingly a branch of the Cincinnati Book Concern was opened there some ten months since, under the charge of Mr. Doughty, a most efficient business man. On the first of January the Northwestern Christian Advocate, under the editorial supervision of Rev. James V. Watson, was also established.

The Universalists on Slavery, &c.—The Universalist General Convention, which was held at Columbus, Ohio, last week, resolved, "that we hereby renew our testimony against those great sins—Slavery, Intemperance, and War; and that we will cordially coöperate in all proper efforts for their suppression." The following resolution was also passed, with but one negative vote:—

"Resolved, That in the progress of the Temperance Cause this Convention hails with pleasure the principle of Prohibitory Legislation, as embodied in the Maine Law, so called, and earnestly hopes that all the States of our Union will follow the illustrious example of the 'Star in the East,' and thus extend the beneficient operations of the law to all the people of this Republic."

Inquiry in Sardinia.—There is a movement reported from Sardinia, of a highly interesting character. The popular mind has seemed to awake in the midst of Italy, as from the sleep of ages, searching for something better than the ceremonies and superstitions of Popery. The spirit of inquiry is abroad, and the reading of the Scriptures, which are sent into the country, is extending it. The work is carried on by natives, without the personal aid of foreigners. It is stated that in Tavale, Sardinia, "seven entire branches of one peasant family, amounting to forty persons, have given themselves to Christ, and constitute a center of light, which is steadily expanding itself in the midst of surrounding darkness."

Economy in Theological Seminaries.—A writer in the Presbyterian complains of a want of economy in the Theological Seminaries of the "Old School" Presbyterians. He says:—

"We have five Theological Seminaries, in which is invested a capital of five hundred thousand dollars, more or less, and sixteen of our select men are employed as teachers. And for what purpose? The instruction of two hundred and twenty-five young men!—a work which could be well done by six suitable men, with a capital of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. If this estimate be correct, then is not our church guilty of wasting the income of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the labors of ten of her choice men?"

The Call for Men.—The Christian enterprises of the day call for men more than for money. Given the men, the money would be forthcoming. But what is to become of these enterprises without the men, is an important and solemn question. The following paragraph, from the Home Mission Record, shows how the matter is viewed by one of our religious institutions of most extensive influence:—

"The Home Mission cause needs MEN as well as money. Not a few large, promising fields are suffering for the want of able-bodied, clear-headed, large-hearted, spiritually-minded men, to gather in the first-fruits of harvest, and sow for other and larger ingatherings hereafter. We are anxiously looking for the right kind of men to go into important places in the Great Central Valley, and to several points of commanding position and influence on the Pacific slope. Would not the Lord be pleased, and the harps of heaven be attuned to a new outburst of songs, if some who read this, now comfortably settled in a city, or village, or rural parish, should say, 'The West needs me more than the East. Here am I, send me!'"

A Groggery in David's Time.—The Rev. Mr. Pierpont, in his address at the Tabernacle, was sure that there were groggeries in David's time, in the lanes and alleys of Jerusalem, with little red curtains before the windows. He was confident there was a description of the dram-seller in the tenth Psalm, which he read with great effect. It is commended to such as are in the trade:—

Verse 6. He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved, for I shall never be in adversity.

7. His mouth is full of cursing, and deceit and fraud; under his tongue is mischief and vanity.

8. He sitteth in the lurking places of the village, in the secret places doth he number the innocent, his eyes are privily set against the poor.

9. He lieth in wait secretly, as a lion in his den; he lieth in wait to catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net—(his shop.)

10. He coucheth and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones—(his strong liquors.)

11. He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotton; he hideth his face, he will never see it.

Advantage of Colportage.—A German colporteur at the West thus refers to some of the advantages of the colporteur work:—

"It is a good thing to be a colporteur. In this service one is not only put in the way to spread the blessings of the gospel, but it is an excellent school, in which he can learn how to live like a Christian, and to teach. Is one timid? he will in time feel bolder. Is one too forward? he will learn modesty. Is one too hasty? he will learn patience. Is one pious? he will grow in grace. Is one striving after holiness? here he will find examples that will put him to shame. Is he sectarian? he will find, from observation and from the example of Christians, that he is mistaken in thinking that he only knows the truth. Does pride adhere to him? his work is humble, and he has to do with the lowly. In short, the colporteur work fits one for every thing. Oh, that many more would choose this delightful employment?"

American Baptist Publication Society.—The 29th Annual Report of this Institution, located at Philadelphia, gives a general view of its operations, with a list of its members, and a catalogue of its publications. The receipts of the past year from all sources were $43,404 88; the expenditures, $43,362 12; leaving a balance in the treasury of $42 76. Of the receipts, $25,699 59 were from sales of merchandize; $2758 56, from donations for general purposes; $2,060 06 for colporteur fund; $1871 48 for building fund. The increase in the value of stock, books, stereotype plates and engravings for the year, was $4869 31; and the total amount of assets is now $65,772 05; showing a gain over the valuation of the last year, of $5281 61. Six Life Managers were made during the year by the payment of $50 and upwards, and forty-nine Life Members by the payment of $20 and upwards.

Temperance.—A Cincinnati paper says:

"Mr. Longworth of this city is extending his operations in the culture of the grape, and the manufacture of wines, &c. He is producing Catawba Brandy, which is pronounced by judges equal to the French Brandies. It is manufactured in the same way, but it is a finer article. Mr. Longworth has 2,000 gallons of brandy of the vintage of 1851."

Mr. Longworth recently set his face against the Maine Law movement, because it would prohibit him from making his wines, and stated at length, that the wine-drinking people of Europe had fewer drunkards among them than those among whom the article was little used. He also defended wine drinking on Scriptural grounds, and offered to prove that the pure juice of the grape was not injurious to man.

To the Anniversaries.—Arrangements have been made with the Rome and Watertown Railroad to take delegates from Rome to Adams Center and back for one fare—tickets to be obtained at the office in Rome after October 3d, and hold good till October 14th. The fare from New York to Rome is $3 26. From Rome to Adams Center and back $1 80. Persons leaving New York by steamboat at 6 o'clock Third-day evening, will reach Adams Fourth-day afternoon. Trains leave Rome for Adams Center at 7 o'clock A. M.; 2.55 and 7.20 P. M.; through in about three hours.

Bible Union Meeting.—The American Bible Union holds its Fourth Anniversary in the meeting-house of the First Baptist Church in New York on Fifth-day and Sixth-day, Oct. 6th and 7th. Among the speakers engaged are Revs. Spencer H. Cone, John L. Waller, T. C. Teasdale, James Lillie, O. B. Judd, G. Achilli, Wm. C. Duncan, and P. F. Jones.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Rev. J. L. Wilson, a returned missionary of the Old School Presbyterian Church, from Africa, recently stated, as among the results of missionary labor in Africa, the gathering of more than one hundred Christian churches, containing ten thousand hopeful converts; the establishment of a hundred and fifty Christian schools, in which from twelve to fifteen thousand youth were receiving Christian and other instruction. The Bible has been translated, and its truths brought into contact, directly or indirectly, with a million of human minds. They had given to Africa eighteen written dialects; and all this without grammars or teachers, or any extrinsic aid; and this had been the work of Protestant missionaries within the space of twenty years.

The Christian Secretary learns by a private note from Jackson, Pa., that the Baptist church in that place has enjoyed a revival of religion since May last, during which period forty converts have been baptized into the fellowship of the church. One remarkable feature of this revival is, that every one that has united with a church has joined the Baptists. Several Pedobaptists became dissatisfied with sprinkling, and have joined the Baptist church.

Elzorah, wife of the Rev. Eleazer King, of Heath, Mass., has sued for divorce on account of desertion. They were married about ten years ago, and about eight months afterward he charged her before a Church Council with having told him he had better study grammar, and give up preaching till he knew more! The Council dismissed this charge, and the offended reverend has ever since refused to live with his wife.

Rome, as it appears from a recent census, contains a population of 175,000, divided into fifty-four parishes, and amongst them twenty-nine bishops, one thousand two hundred and eighty priests, two thousand and ninety-two monks and members of religious orders, one thousand six hundred and ninety-eight nuns, and five hundred and thirty-seven ecclesiastical pupils.

Two missionaries of the Old School Presbyterian church, viz., Rev. Edwin T. Williams, and William Clemens, with their wives, have taken passage in the bark Gem from New York, for the island of Cariseo on the coast of Africa. This is intended to be a point for a new American colony, having a magnificent bay and a healthful climate, with superior advantages for commerce.

Miss Antoinette L. Brown, whose name is already familiar to the public, in consequence of the conspicuous figure she has cut as a public speaker at temperance and anti-slavery conventions, was ordained as pastor of the Congregational church in South Butler, N. Y., a place lying between Syracuse and Rochester, Sept. 15.

The second Sunday of November next is the day appointed by the New School General Assembly for raising the $100,000 to constitute a permanent fund to aid congregations in the erection of houses of worship; on that day, every church under the care of the Assembly is expected to make its contribution.

There is a Methodist preacher near Ripon, Eng., seventy years of age, who for forty years has walked five miles every Sunday to preach, and returned in the evening. He has thus walked 20,000 miles; and the sole pecuniary reward he has ever received, was a shilling on one occasion, or a fraction more than one farthing per annum.

We observe afloat the statement, which is presumed to be correct, that "nearly five hundred of the graduates of Amherst College—almost one half of its Alumni—have entered the ministry. They compose now more than one-fifth of the Congregational ministers of Massachusetts; and more than forty of them have gone as missionaries to the heathen."

Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio, will be dedicated on Wednesday, Oct. 5th, at 10½ A. M. Dedicatory Address by Hon. Horace Mann, LL.D., whose inauguration as President will take place on the same day.

The Rev. C. W. Gaillard, of Mississippi, has been appointed missionary to China by the Foreign Board of the Southern Baptist Convention. He expects to sail for China in the course of the present fall.

The latest news from England brings the sad intelligence of the death of Rev. Dr. Cox, known by his writings and long ministry, and to many personally in this country by his presence among us seventeen years ago in company with Dr. Hoby.

The Pope has just established four new Bishopricks in this country, viz: at Brooklyn, L. I., Newark, N. J., Burlington, Vt., and Portland, Me.

Just the thing for those who would keep posted up in that department. Published by the Society, 48 Beekman-st., New York.

European News.

The steamer Africa, with European dates to Sept. 10, arrived at New York on the 23d.

Nothing definite respecting the Eastern question, but the circumstance that the Czar hesitates in reference to the modifications stipulated for by the Porte, had depressed the British and French funds. About the 16th instant was the date when a reply from St. Petersburg might be looked for. There was, however, a rumor that the Czar refuses the Turkish terms.

Gen. Sir Charles Napier had been buried at Portsmouth with all the honors due to his rank and service. Nearly 3,000 private soldiers sought and obtained leave to attend his funeral. Standing by the plain brick grave in which the remains of his relative were deposited, Sir W. Napier pronounced a funeral oration, which was almost Oriental in its style and terseness. "Soldiers! There lies one of the best men—the best soldiers—the best Christians—that ever lived. He served you faithfully, and you served him faithfully. God is just!"

A trial of reaping machines had been made at Stirling, Eng. The first prize was awarded to Bell's, and the second to McCormick's, against twenty-one competitors.

Vienna letters state that cholera was making great inroads in Russia, especially in the Southern Provinces, where large bodies of troops were stationed. It had also made its appearance at various points on the frontier of Eastern Gallicia.

We have further details of the recent earthquake at Thebes. The town, or rather village, was built partly of stone houses, which were all new, and partly of old houses of wood and bricks. All were more or less injured, the former having been rendered uninhabitable. Eleven persons were killed, and eighteen were rescued from the fallen ruins. The survivors were encamped in the open air, and were suffering from want of water, the earthquake having dried up the wells. Seventeen villages in the vicinity of Thebes, as far as Platea, had partially suffered, and one or two houses fell at Chalkis. The shocks continued for some days, one to three shocks within the twenty-four hours.

Viâ St. Petersburgh, it is stated that the troubles excited in Persia by the fanatical sect of the Babis, who some time since attempted to assassinate the Shah, still continued. They lately spread a report that the Shah was dead, which His Majesty found it necessary to contradict by making a public promenade, accompanied by his Court, through the bazaars and principal streets of his Capital. Several of the Babis were arrested, and put to death by torture, in presence of the people.

California News.

Two weeks later news from California was received in New York on the 25th inst., by the steamer Northern Light. She brought also a full load of passengers, and about $1,500,000 in gold dust.

The two men who murdered Mr. Beekman at Volcano, California, in July last, were discovered in a very extraordinary manner, on board the steamer Brother Jonathan, on her downward trip on the 8th inst. Having murdered their victim, and stolen several thousand dollars out of his store, they set out for the Atlantic States, via the Great American Desert. Sickness drove them back to Marysville, Cal., where they disposed of their mules, &c. They then came down to San Francisco, changed their names, and took steerage passage on board the Brother Jonathan. They were there discovered by Mr. John Mace, of Missouri, who had known them long before, when laboring in the mines at Volcano. Mr. Mace reported the case to one of the officers on board the boat, and subsequently to a few of the cabin passengers. When the case became ripe for examination, a committee of inquiry, consisting of six, was appointed. They took down in writing the deposition of John Mace. The two men, whose names were Sailor Harry and John Fox, were arrested and examined. They testified against each other, after much prevarication. They were then put in irons, under a guard, until the Brother Jonathan should return to San Francisco, to which place they would be conveyed.

The following summary embraces the principal items of news for the fortnight:—

The Indian outbreaks in the Rogue river valley, in the North, are becoming serious and threatening. It is not improbable that general hostilities will be the consequence in that part of the State and the southern part of Oregon.

The murderers and thieves who have so long infested the State, have been faring somewhat badly of late. A number of them have been brought to summary account, and forfeited their lives for their crimes.

A rendezvous of villains, of all grades and characters, was recently discovered in the sink of the Humboldt River, east of the Sierra Nevada. A murderer was traced by a party from Calaveras county, to the rendezvous where about one hundred and fifty of the outlaws were discovered in San Francisco.

From various circumstances it is more than probable that the "Joixsie Rangers" whose supposed capture of the renowned bandit Joaquin Muriatta created so much talk lately, were mistaken in their man and decapitated an unlucky person who went out with a party from Los Angeles to catch wild horses.

The journeymen bricklayers in San Francisco struck for an increase of wages from $10 to $12 per day, and obtained it. The hod carriers struck successfully for $6.

Tragical Scene at Niagara.—We have received a singular narration of a narrow escape of life at the Falls of Niagara. Mr. E. V. Wilson, of this city, of lightning-rod notoriety, went to the Falls with a party, and among the number was Mrs. N. L. Piper (of the firm of H. Piper and Brother.) The lady at the time was laboring under a species of insanity. It was thought by her husband, that traveling and change of air and scenery would do her good, but unfortunately such was not the case. Immediately upon her arrival, she was very desirous to see the Falls; and while standing on the Canada side, at about twenty feet from the falling sheet of water, she slipped her arm from Mr. Wilson, and made a rush towards the precipice. He rushed after her, and just as she was going over, he caught hold of her dress, and by it held her dangling in the air. The dress gave way, and she fell upon a ledge of rock, at a distance of twenty feet. As she thus lay, Wilson, our narrative says, "with great presence of mind, looked for a soft place," and discovering that a quantity of loose earth was lying on the rocks, he jumped down on it. He was just in time to save her going over the main precipice. By the aid of a pair of long lines belonging to a team close by, they were both drawn up together. Both suffered some from contusions, but neither was seriously hurt. [Toronto Colonist.

Return of the Pleasure Yacht.—Cornelius Vanderbilt's pleasure yacht "North Star" returned to New York on the 23d inst. The trip home was a very short one. The vessel sailed from Constantinople on the evening of the 26th of August, and arrived at Gibraltar on the 2d of September, a distance of 1,850 miles, which she performed in seven days, mean time, making an average speed of 11 knots per hour, and using only two boilers. After a stay of six days at Gibraltar, during which time the passengers visited the town and fortifications, and partook of the hospitalities of the authorities, she steamed to Funchal, Madeira. The grape crop there is a total failure, owing to the diseased state of the vines. The people in the interior of the Island are in almost as destitute a condition as they were two years since, when we sent them relief. On the evening of the 12th she sailed from Madeira for New York, and arrived in ten days and twenty hours; one-third of the distance was performed with two boilers only, consuming an average of twenty-five tuns per day. This is said to be the quickest run ever made by any steamer. The entire distance performed by the North Star, since her departure for New York, has been 15,000 miles, occupying 58½ days, during 19 of which the four boilers were used, and for the remainder of the time only two. She performed 6,000 miles, consuming only 500 tuns of coal.

Adulteration of Cream of Tartar.—A writer in The Boston Journal states that bitartrate of Potassa, or Cream of Tartar, extensively used in bread-making, is villainously adulterated. The result of a chemical examination of six specimens of the article, showed that of one hundred parts of the purest specimen, sixty-two parts were foreign matter. The added ingredients consisted of white sand, ground pummice, ground rice, and flour. This is a vile compound to offer to a sick child or to an adult invalid.

"If the purchaser will provide himself with a small phial of the solution of iodine, and place a drop in connection with the suspected article, the presence of flour, or any article containing starch, is instantly shown by the blue tint which follows. Let him place a few grains in boiling water, and if it is not entirely soluble, let him reject it. An experienced dealer can always judge with a great degree of accuracy by the appearance of the article. Pure cream of tartar is intensely white, and has a degree of moisture and cohesion about it entirely unlike flour, or any of the articles used to adulterate it."

Murder of a Returned Californian.—The Louisville Courier tells of a terrible murder under the following circumstances:—A man on his return home from California to Jackson County, Illinois, a few weeks since, was met a short distance only from his house by a neighbor, who, upon learning he had money, killed and robbed him. Another person happened to be coming that way, and having his attention attracted by the report of a gun, espied the villain dragging his victim into the bushes. Immediately upon being discovered, the murderer commenced reloading his gun; but before he succeeded, the man rushed upon him, knocked him down, and secured him as a prisoner. The deceased was a man of family; had been absent some two years, and had suffered all the perils, hardships and privations of the pioneer California gold diggers, for the sake of a little money, and was brutally murdered for it when almost in sight of his wife and children, by one whom he regarded as a friend.

Meneely's Bell Foundry.—The Messrs. Meneely have recently added to their heretofore extensive establishment, the largest Furnace building, for the manufacture of Church Bells, in the United States, if not in the world. It measures sixty feet in width and one hundred feet in length, and is complete in every part. The various shops for machinery, instruments, blacksmithing, trimming, hanging, carpenter work, &c., also cover a large space, and are filled with busy workmen. The Furnace is very conveniently arranged, having separate rooms for every kind of material used, large ovens for drying the moulds, sand, &c. The whole is to be lighted with gas. The Proprietors were the first to manufacture and use the Iron Cases, over which the moulds are made. This is a very great improvement over the old and tedious method heretofore employed, and bells made in this manner are not only smoother than those cast by the former process, but ring better. We are informed that the demand for their bells is such that they are constantly behind their orders. [Albany Evening Journal.

The new English Houses of Parliament, in London, have already cost nearly nine millions of dollars, and are not yet finished.

A New Machine.—A new machine has been invented by Mr. William Mitchell, of this city, for the purpose of setting type. It has keys like a piano, with a number of endless tapes, kept in motion by machinery, to carry the types to the spot where they are set up. The types are laid with the nicked side up, in little brass cases or galleys, some fifteen or eighteen inches long, and just wide enough to admit a type crosswise. Of these cases there are as many as there are small letters and punctuation marks, and they are fixed at an inclination of about 45° over the types, so that when a key is touched a type drops flat upon its tape, and is instantly conveyed to another larger tape, to which all the types are carried, and which conveys them all to a little metallic throat, down which they drop upon a table all set up, but requiring to be divided into lines, or justified, by hand. Capitals and Italics have to be laid on the tapes by hand, there being in the machine no keys or galleys for them. Two persons are required to attend the machine—one to work the keys, and one to justify and remove the matter composed. It is a very ingenious invention. All its parts are simple, and we judge that it would not easily get out of order. It occupies rather more space, perhaps, than a piano.

Printing at Railroad Speed.—One of the inventions on exhibition at the Crystal Palace is a new printing press, which prints uncut paper, rolling from a cylinder, and cuts and folds with perfect regularity 30,000 per hour. There is no counteraction in the process, and consequently no time lost in returning motion. Both sides are printed at the same time, and 30,000 per hour is a low estimate, since, by increasing the speed, they can be printed as fast as paper or cloth can be unrolled from a cylinder. The inventor declares that he can print one mile of newspaper as fast as a locomotive can run on a railway. With perfect machinery and arrangements he may do it. His present experiment demonstrates a practical principle, and the invention is looked upon with wonder and delight.

A Powerful Pump.—The Norristown (Pa.) Free Press says that a house in that town are manufacturing, for the use of a silver mining company in New Leon, Mexico, an improved Cornish engine and pumps, of greater power and capacity for mining purposes than has ever been built in this country.

The engine is, as follows: 150 horse power; cylinder 60 inches in diameter; 10 feet stroke, to be worked with three of West's improved boilers, and has sufficient power to work the necessary pumps to the depth of one thousand feet, and will discharge 800 gallons water per minute. The first pump in the shaft will be a "plunger lift" of 240 feet.

Fined for Lying.—It is an offense against the law in France, for a dealer in breadstuffs to say that he has effected a sale at a higher price than he has in reality received, if the falsehood is uttered at a moment of panic in the market, and may contribute to a rise in price. Thus a baker in Nancy has just been condemned by the Correctional Tribunal, on the demand of the imperial procureur, to eight days' imprisonment for having said at a café that he had sold fifty bags of flour at 44 francs a piece, while the price really paid was but 43 francs.

SUMMARY.

A driver in Cincinnati, a few days since, was fined $25 for running his wagon against a pedestrian who was crossing the street. The horse was on a walk when the gentleman attempted to cross, but before he had got half way over, the driver of the horse made him go faster, thus frustrating the design of the gentleman, who could not even get out of the way by running. The Judge decided that at all regular street-crossings pedestrians had the right of way, and that the law requires a driver to hold up when he sees a foot-passenger crossing in front of his team.

A monster clipper ship, called The Great Republic, is soon to be launched in Boston. While in the course of construction, she has been visited by over 30,000 persons, during working hours, and by perhaps as many more on Sundays and holidays. She is a wonderful vessel, and every time we look at her, we can not but admire the genius and skill which have produced her. She is between 6,000 and 7,000 tuns stowage capacity, and is the longest and sharpest vessel ever built in this country. She is 325 feet long, 53 feet wide, and 33 feet deep, with four decks, and is of a model so perfectly beautiful, as to seem perfection itself.

Commencing October 19th, and continuing until the 22d of October, there is to be at Springfied, Massachusetts, a grand National Exhibition of imported blood and American breed horses. The exhibition is to be held under the auspices of the United States Agricultural Society, of which Hon. Marshall P. Wilder is President, and a committee with officers from that Society will be present to coöperate with the local committee of the exhibition. The exhibition is open to competitors from all parts of the Union. A very liberal set of premiums has been prepared, to be distributed to the successful competitors.

Ninety-five miles of new canal, reaching from Pittston, Luzerne County, to Athens, in Bradford County, Pa., will be brought into use, for the first time, on the 15th October, when water is to be let into it by order of the Canal Commissioners. Extensive orders for coal to supply Western New York have already been given. From Athens to the New York State line, 2¾ miles distant, an extension canal is making, to connect with the New York Junction Canal, leading direct to New York City. This work is to be completed by the 1st of April next.

The new Granite Tower on the highest ground in Mount Auburn Cemetery, is nearly completed. It is designed as an observatory, from which not only all the grounds of the Cemetery may be seen, but the whole country around for many miles. It is 60 feet high, with a spiral stone stair-way leading to its top. The Chapel, which was built by contract, and very imperfectly constructed, is to be rebuilt and beautified, and made more worthy of its elegant plan and the style of everything around it.

The Democrats of Delaware Township, Hunterdon County, N. J., at their recent election for delegates to the State Convention, instructed their delegates to vote for no man for Governor who is suspected of being in favor of the Maine Liquor Law.

A dispatch dated Providence, R. I., Sept. 25, 1853, says: The store of Geo. W. Babcock, in one of the most crowded streets in this city, was entered, yesterday noon, and robbed of forty or fifty watches, and other valuable property. A man was arrested on suspicion at the Earl House, and on searching his baggage, the stolen property was found. He gave his name as Williams.

In a recent debate in the House of Commons, it was stated that the catalogue of the library of the British Museum, now in process of compilation, has already cost one hundred thousand pounds, and is so far from being complete, that it cannot be finished in less than forty years. This catalogue already fills 1200 folio volumes. When completed, it will form, according to a statement in the London Morning Chronicle, "a neat portable work of 13,000 volumes."

Levi Rose, of Granville, Massachusetts, who died in 1830, at the age of 83 years, had a family of 8 children, all of whom are now living. They met at the house of one of the brothers in June last, for the first time in 48 years. The oldest was 74, the youngest 56, and their united ages 514 years. They had traveled 2900 miles to enjoy this interview. The grandmother of this family, so remarkable for its longevity, lived to the age of 103. Her husband perished in a fire which consumed his buildings.

The rumsellers of New York have struck for an advance of prices. At a meeting recently held, they resolved "that in consequence of the great rise in the price of brandy, we, the retail dealers in the article, find it impossible to obtain a living from selling it at the present price; therefore, that we do now agree, that on and after the first day of October next, 10 cents a glass shall be charged for brandy, in place of 6¼ cents."

There is to be a subterranean railway built in London from the lower end of Edgeware road to the King's Cross. The length will be less than two miles and a half. There will be stations at very short distances, say at every quarter of a mile. The charge for the whole distance in the first class will be only two pence. Every carriage will be abundantly lighted. It is expected that the line will be in full operation in little more than twelve months.

Benjamin J. Ferris, of Ithaca, N. Y., late Secretary of State in Utah, has just returned. He reports that not half the degradation of the Mormons has been told; that Brigham Young has forty wives; and that seditious feelings are rife throughout the community. In short, that women and men are in a state of deep degradation.

A man, named Alexander Mullen, was hung at Omagh, Ireland, for the murder of his aunt. Efforts had been made to obtain a reprieve, chiefly on the ground that the unfortunate convict "had been utterly ignorant of the principles of Christianity, the goal chaplain having discovered, previous to his trial, that he had never even heard the name of the Saviour!"

John G. Paschal, of Pope county, Arkansas, was recently murdered, and his body thrown into the Arkansas river. Wm O. Wilson, a wealthy planter, of Conway county, with whom he had a quarrel, was arrested on suspicion of committing the murder. On the night of the 26th ult., Wilson was shot dead by some unknown person while in prison.

A Cincinnati exchange says: "The success of Dr. Caroline Brown in the practice of the medical profession has already had a sensible effect on the ladies in the country round about Cincinnati. Six young ladies, of good families and superior education, have applied for admission to the Eclectic Medical College at the approaching term."

A terrible encounter is reported to have taken place in the mountains near El Paso, between a party of 14 Americans and some 200 Apachees, in which 11 of the Americans were killed. The U. S. dragoons stationed near the spot were too few in number to render any assistance in repelling the Indians.

The New York State Agricultural Fair came off at Saratoga last week. It was inferior to some previous Fairs, both in respect to attendance and the number of articles on exhibition. In cattle, however, the show was very good.

The Cashier of the treasury of Pennsylvania has just published a statement in the Harrisburg papers, which shows the State finances to be in a most prosperous condition. According to his statement the State debt on the 1st of December, 1851, was $40,332,543.

It is stated in the New York Evening Post, that Mr. N. G. Norcross of Lowell, known as the "timber king," has purchased the stumpage on 560,000 acres of land on the Ottowa river, in Canada. A few years ago he bought 140,000 acres near the course of the Merrimack river, and is now about to enlarge his business.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin," dramatized, is now played at two theaters in Philadelphia—the "National" and "Chesnut." The piece creates great interest, and the places where it is played are crowded nightly, by a class of persons not accustomed to visit theaters.

A dispatch dated Bangor, Me., Saturday, Sept. 24, 1853, says: The saw-mill of Gen. Veazie, in this place, was destroyed by fire yesterday. Loss, $30,000. An insurance on the property for $20,000, in Hartford, expired a few days since; the loss is therefore total.

The practice of cutting twelve-cent stamps into halves and quarters in order to obtain six cent and three cent stamps, is declared by the highest authorities to be illegal; stamps so cut are worthless.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

Miscellaneous.

A Glimpse of the Crystal Palace.

A correspondent of the Presbyterian gives the following very natural account of his impressions on a first visit to the Crystal Palace:—

The "Palace" is a conspicuous object to the traveler approaching New York from various directions. Even as low down as the Jersey City Ferry, the Latting Observatory, looking like an immensely tall church steeple, lifts its long spire far above all surrounding objects; whilst, alongside of it, towers up the bright dome of the Crystal Palace, with the national flag floating over it. A sojourn of a few hours in New York will enable a stranger to take a bird's eye view of the Exhibition. He can reach it from any of the prominent hotels in Broadway most conveniently, either by the Sixth Avenue Railroad, or by several lines of omnibuses—which carry you directly to the spot. It is a long way up there, however, and those who happen to get into an overloaded omnibus, dependent for its locomotion on the horse-power of two jaded, emaciated relics of horses, will be apt to wonder if they never are coming to the Palace. They will probably, too, before reaching the end of the long journey through the streets, come to the conclusion, that New York is at least "considerable of a village." The New York Hotel, Grace Church, and Union Square will be considered tolerably well up-town by a stranger; but after reaching Union Square, he has some thirty more blocks to traverse before he gets to the Palace. He will have intimations from the numerous minor "exhibitions," as he draws near the object of his visit, that he is getting into its neighborhood. On a small, white corner house the public are informed, that "A Live Alligator" is open for inspection—the picture of the ferocious reptile in the act of devouring a horse, with jaws wide enough for the horse to jump into, and a most extraordinary torrent of blood pouring from the neck of the poor animal, where the alligator has begun the work of eating him up—being painted in bold colors outside, as an excitant to the curious to pay their shilling, and see the show within. Or, he will be greeted over another door, with the portrait of an ox from somewhere about the Rocky Mountains or the Pacific, which seems to have a pair of arms growing out of its neck; or, one of the "Three Brothers," being three monstrous overgrown men. Quite a Crystal Palace village has grown up in the neighborhood—the projectors of which seem to have been under the impression, that the ruling passions of visitors to the Fair would be to see animal monstrosities and get something to drink.

The exterior of the Palace is graceful and imposing. The architectural proportions are good; the bright bronze, which is the prevailing color of the outside—the vast extent of milky-looking glass, of which the walls are constructed—the happy adjustment of the sides, roof, and angles of the octagonal structure—the turrets, flags, and spacious entrances, and especially the airy, lofty dome, springing up and crowning all, makes a very pleasing and somewhat unique impression on the visitor. Approaching the main entrance, you find on either hand the notice, "Enter Here" affixed to a narrow passage-way, where you present your ticket, and pass through a revolving frame-work, which gives a tick, as you go along, to register the entrance of another visitor. A very polite person requests your umbrella, cane, or whatever else you may have, with which you might do mischief to the contents of the Palace, and delivers you a cheque, which will secure their return as you pass out. Once within, you have before you a spacious, light, gay area, irregular, lofty, broken up by stairways, galleries, and columns, overarched by the concave of the beautiful dome, and filled with statuary and paintings, silks, and woollen fabrics of every hue, rich furniture, musical instruments, cutlery, fire-arms, agricultural implements, machinery, &c., with the names of "Austria," "Italy," "Great Britain and Ireland," "Switzerland," "United States," &c., on various sign-boards, designating the countries to which the productions belong. "Why, this is nothing but a great bazaar!" said one of our party upon taking a first glance; and so it is, in some respects, a bazaar on a large scale, except that the articles displayed are not for sale just now.

Here, under the center of the dome, the most conspicuous object in the Palace, is a colossal equestrian statue of Washington, by the Baron Marochetti. It is, indeed, colossal. We have not time to examine it in detail, but just on this passing glimpse, both horse and rider seem too heavy and Dutch-like. Not far off, on the periphery of this central area, is the Amazon on horseback in conflict with a tiger—a full-sized statue in bronze which received many commendations at the London Exhibition; whilst around other portions of this area, and along the walls, are a great number of pieces of statuary, chiefly from Italy, many of them very beautiful. The veiled heads are extremely curious—the veils over the faces, though in marble, looking very much like real veils. Standing in a large semi-circular space, against a dark surface, are the colossal figures in plaster, of our Saviour and the Apostles, by Thorwalsden. Each countenance is expressive of a strong-marked character. John's is particularly seraphic, perhaps almost too womanly. Judas, I believe is not amongst them.

But we must pass on. Here is a most artistic array of the finest English cutlery; and here several persons are arranging two or three of Stoddart's London Pianos, one of which is smaller than the American pianos. The grand one, whose power a visitor is trying, has a deep, rich tone. Next these are exquisitely rich tables, the wood, carving, gilding, and whole finish of which are of the finest description. But our lady friends are quite carried away with this immensely large white table-cloth from Dublin, covered with the most beautiful designs. They have never seen anything like that. In the German department are rich worsted curtain goods; pianos, whose outside appearance does not promise much; a costly piece of ebony furniture, and a great many other rare and elegant articles. We have not time to look at this French China, except to give a passing glance, and say "beautiful," nor to examine this unique collection of woods, nor this mass of skins and furs. We have not long to look around us, this visit, and must make a cursory survey of the galleries.

We had expected to find the handsomest display on the main floor, but we rather think the galleries carry off the palm. Our eyes surely never did behold such silver ware as is in these cases from London—not engraved or chased, but with the ornamental figures entire, attached to a terrace on the outside of the pitchers and vases, and standing out bodily from them. The display of the same sort of articles from one of our most celebrated American establishments, looks common and plain, after such elaborate work as this. Such laces, too, as are here! Honiton, and every sort of delicate and richly wrought variety, which, for the sake of the purses of husbands, the good sense of wives, and the consciences of all parties, it is to be hoped nobody will ever buy. Beside some of these articles of needle-work, sits a most lady-like young person, whose tongue tells that she must have come from Dublin with some of these beautiful articles, and whom the visitor will find almost as interesting as the other productions of Ireland which he is admiring. Here is a "live Yankee," too, with some sort of a machine that he has invented—we do not know what—but in passing him, we heard him tell a spectator he was certain he could convince him that that machine was the best thing of the sort that had ever been invented. These moustached French people in the French department, as they parlez-vous with their fellow-countrymen, who have to come to see them, with the Parisian signs above their goods, almost carry one back to Johnny Crapaul's dominions again. A great variety of bronzes and Parian marble wares tempt one to pause; but time presses, and we must go on. Nor can we stop to examine these Mexican-looking saddles, nor these odd Austrian shooting dresses, nor these velvets, nor a thousand other things. This exhibition is the study for many days. A cursory survey will do for the first time. We have taken that, and will go now, hoping to return before a great while again.

Foreign Method of Checking Baggage.

We find in a foreign paper an account of a new method of checking baggage. It has been introduced upon one or two of the lead ing English railroads, and is said to answer the design admirably. Its operation, in brief, is something like this:—

When a train, say a down train, arrives at any particular station, a porter attends with a book about the size of the London Directory. It contains tickets of stiff card-board, bound in the book. Each ticket is about three inches long and one inch wide. It is partly cut, so that two separate parts of it can be easily torn off. The tickets are numbered differently, but each of the three parts of a ticket has the same number. The outer part of the ticket has a loop of tape gummed to it. Suppose a person arrives at a station and is not going on by the train for an hour or two, or a day, and is desirous of leaving a carpet bag or a trunk at the station. He pays one penny, and in a moment the taped portion of a platform ticket is fastened to the handle of the carpet-bag. This portion bears, as has already been stated, a printed number, also the words—"Deposited at Winchester," or whatever the station may be, and likewise the words, "for down train." Another portion of the ticket, with the same number as the last, is torn off and given to the owner of the carpet-bag, to be presented at the station when the article is wanted. The words "for down train" are omitted on this portion. The portion of the ticket left in the book corresponds with that given to the passenger, and is a check on the money taker. The company then become responsible for the safety of the property. Luggage is divided into three classes—that for the down train, the up train, and to be left till called for, and should be sorted into three different compartments at the station. For each division there is a separate book of tickets. If a person were to find or steal a ticket, and apply for property, he would be instantly detected, because he would first have to say whether the luggage was for the up or down train, or to be left till called for, which he could not do unless he owned it. There is no necessity for any address to be on the baggage. One penny per package per diem is charged for a platform ticket.

Improvement in Railroad Cars.

On the 15th inst., the Hudson River Railroad sent an excursion train to Peekskill, the occasion being the trial of the new saloon cars, and the test of a plan to relieve railroad passengers from the annoyance of dust, smoke, locomotive cinders, and the noise produced by the car-wheels. There were three of the new style of cars in the train. These are divided into rooms about six feet square, to which entrance is gained from a hall that extends along the side of the car. Each room is fitted up in fine style, having a sofa which will seat five persons comfortably, four or five cushioned arm-chairs, and a small table. Upon the floor is a rich Brussels carpet, and the walls and ceilings are painted and gilded in a beautiful manner. The windows and ventilators are well arranged, so that thrusting heads and arms out is a difficult matter.

On the way up, Mr. Salisbury, the inventor, exhibited and explained to members of the Press and others, his patent "Dust Controller." He proposes to inclose the space under the train by hanging panels to each side of the cars over the wheels, which will come down just outside the rail, nearly to the ground. The reason for hanging them is, that they may be turned up to the side of the cars when it is necessary, to inspect and repair wheels, brakes, &c. These panels are to be double, and filled in with felt or some other substance in order to deaden the sound from the wheels, and thus enable passengers within the cars to converse, without having their voices drowned by the noise as at present. He also has a sort of second platform connecting the cars, beneath the car platform, to confine the dust and sound at those points. By this means he forms a close passage under the whole length of the train, through which the dust will be driven by the draft of air created by the motion of the car. He proposes also to turn the smoke and cinders from the locomotive through this passage. For that purpose the under part of the car and the inner surface of the panels and connecting platform will be made fire-proof. These panels inclosing the wheels will also prevent persons or children from accidentally getting under the train, as no one can fall between the cars.

An English gentleman has ascertained the depth of the Niagara River, at the Suspension Bridge, to be 125 feet. At Black Rock it has been found, by measurement, to be only about 30, and the force of the current rated at about five miles an hour.

Nothing is Lost.

BY JOHN GRITCHLEY PRINCE.

Nothing is lost; the drop of dew
  Which trembles on the leaf or flower
Is but exhaled, to fall anew
  In summer's thunder shower;
Perchance to shine within the bow
  That fronts the sun at fall of day;
Perchance to sparkle in the flow
  Of fountains far away.

Nought lost, for even the tiniest seed
  By wild birds borne, or breezes blown,
Finds something suited to its need
  Wherein 'tis sown and grown;
Perchance finds sustenance and soil
  In some remote and desert place,
Or mid the crowded homes of toil
  Finds usefulness and grace.

The little drift of common dust,
  By the March winds disturbed and tossed,
Though scattered by the fitful gust,
  Is changed, but never lost;
It yet may bear some sturdy stem,
  Some proud oak battling with the blast,
Or crown with verdurous diadem
  Some ruin of the past.

The furnace quenched, the flame put out,
  Still cling to earth, or soar in air,
Transformed, diffused, and blown about,
  To burn again elsewhere;
Haply, to make the beacon-blaze,
  Which gleams athwart the briny waste,
Or light the social lamp, whose rays
  Illume the home of taste.

The touching tones of minstrel art,
  The breathings of the mournful flute,
Which we have heard with listening hearts,
  Are not extinct when mute.
The language of some household song,
  The perfume of some cherished flower,
Though gone from outward sense, belong
  To memories' after hour.

So with our words, or harsh, or kind,
  Uttered, they are not all forgot,
They leave their influence on the mind,
  Pass on, but perish not;
As they are spoken, so they fall
  Upon the spirit spoken to,
Scorch it like drops of burning gall,
  Or soothe like honey dew.

So with our deeds, for good or ill,
  They have their power scarce understood;
Then let us use our better will.
  To make them rife with good;
Like circles on the lake they go,
  Ring, within ring, and never stay;
O, that our deeds were fashioned so
  That they might bless alway!

Then since the lesser things ne'er die,
  But work beyond our poor control,
Say, shall that suppliant for the sky,
  The greatest human soul?
Ah, no! it still will spurn the past,
  And search the future for its rest,—
O, joy! if it be found at last
  Among the pure and blest!

Library Catalogues.

At the Convention of Librarians held in New York week before last, Professor Jewett gave the following account of a plan proposed by the Smithsonian Institution to secure cheap and complete catalogues for large libraries:—

Few persons, except librarians, are aware of the nature and extent of the difficulties which have been encountered in attempting to furnish suitable printed catalogues of large and growing libraries; difficulties apparently insurmountable, and menacing a common abandonment of the hope of affording guides, so important, to literary accumulations of the larger libraries of Europe.

While the catalogue of a large library is passing through the press, new books are received, the titles of which it is impossible, in the ordinary manner of printing, to incorporate with the body of the work. Recourse must then be had to a supplement. In no other way can the acquisitions of the library be made known to the public. If the number of supplements be multiplied, as they have been in the library of Congress, the student may be obliged to grope his weary way through ten catalogues, instead of one, in order to ascertain whether the book which he seeks be in the library. He cannot be certain, even then, that the book is not in the collection, for it may have been received since the last appendix was printed. Supplements soon become intolerable. The whole catalogue must then be reärranged and re-printed. The expense of this process may be borne so long as the library is small, but it soon becomes burdensome, and, ere long, insupportable, even to national establishments.

There is but one course left—not to print at all. To this no scholar consents, except from necessity. But to this alternative, grievous as it is, nearly all the large libraries of Europe have been reluctantly driven.

More than a century has passed, since the printing of the catalogue of the Royal Library at Paris was commenced. It is not yet finished. No one feels in it the interest which he would, if he could hope to have its completeness sustained, when once brought up to a given date.

Not one European library, of the first class, has a complete printed catalogue, in a single work. The Bodleian Library is not an exception. It may be necessary to search six distinct catalogues, in order to ascertain whether any specified book was or was not in that collection, at the close of the year 1847.

This is, surely, a disheartening state of things. It has been felt and lamented by every one who has had the care of an increasing library.

As a remedy for this evil, it is proposed to stereotype the titles separately, and to preserve the plates or blocks, in alphabetical order of the titles, so as to be able readily to insert additional titles, in their proper places, and then to reprint the whole catalogue. By these means, the chief cost of re-publication (that of composition) together with the trouble of revision and correction of the press, would, except for new titles, be avoided. Some of the great difficulties, which have so long oppressed and discouraged librarians, and involved libraries in enormous expenses, may be thus overcome.

The peculiar position of the Smithsonian Institution suggested the application of this plan, on a wider scale, and for a more important purpose, than that of merely facilitating the publication of new and complete editions of separate catalogues.

It has been proposed to form a general catalogue of all the books in the country, with references to the libraries where each might be found. The plan of stereotyping titles, separately, suggested the following system for the accomplishment of the important purpose:—

1. The Smithsonian Institution to publish rules for the preparation of catalogues.
2. Other institutions, intending to publish catalogues of their books, to be requested to prepare them in accordance with these rules, with a view to their being stereotyped under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution.
3. The Smithsonian Institution to pay the whole extra expense of stereotyping, or such part thereof as may be agreed on.
4. The stereotyped titles to remain the property of the Smithsonian Institution.
5. Every library acceding to this plan, to have the right of using all the titles in the possession of the institution as often as desired, for the printing of its own catalogue by the Smithsonian Institution, paying only the expense of making up the pages, of press-work, and of distributing the titles to their proper places.
6. The Smithsonian Institution to publish, as soon as possible, and at stated intervals, a General Catalogue of all Libraries coming into this system.

The most important advantages to be derived from this plan will be the economy of time, labor and expense required for the preparation of a new edition of a catalogue, to include the books added since a former edition was published. On Professor Jewett's plan, when the catalogue of a library is published, it will be necessary to strike off only so many copies as are needed for present use. When the editions to the library have become so considerable as to make another edition of the catalogue desirable, or in lieu thereof a supplementary catalogue, (always an unsatisfactory and embarrassing appendage,) the new titles only will be stereotyped and inserted in their proper places among the former titles, all the titles being on movable plates. The pages of the new edition will thus be made up with convenience, and every book in the library will stand in its proper place in the catalogue. This process will be repeated as often as the growth of the library may make it necessary.

In this way, not only will the plates, used in a former edition, be made available for each subsequent edition, but when the plan is fairly and extensively in operation, most of the titles of books added to any given library, of whose catalogue a new edition is required, will, in the meantime, have been cast for some other catalogue, and thus occasion no new charge for any subsequent use, as far as the expense of casting the plates is concerned.

How to kill Slugs.

A correspondent of the Mark Lane Express gives the following method of destroying slugs. It is cheap, and will benefit the soil, though it may not destroy the little pests:—

If you suspect slugs working above ground, (I know nothing of their underground work, but I have no doubt they work above ground at night in all cases,) have your land carefully examined by a trustworthy man, with a lantern, about one or two hours after dark, on a moist and as warm a night as you can find at the season of the year; then, having ascertained that they are there, sow broadcast at night, and the same sort of night, from six to ten bushels of quicklime per acre. Very likely you will have to repeat the dose; and the head-lands should always be done twice, as the hedges and banks harbor them. The expense is but trifling. Two men, the lime having been previously deposited in convenient places, will easily sow eight acres per night before twelve o'clock. I give them rather more than I should for the same hours of day-work, and about two quarts of ale each night, [!] and they (I always employ the same two) are responsible for looking at the lands I suspect. I once had to sow eight acres of mangel three times, the headlands four times, and saved the crop, which turned out remarkably good. This year I sowed twenty-four acres of wheat twice in the autumn, and eight acres of it again in the spring.

Another correspondent thus effectually prevents all future depredations, at least from those which he catches:—

Strew some fresh cabbage, lettuce, or other succulent leaves, near the scene of action, and visit your leaves every morning, when you will find great numbers of them—who have been out on the feed all night—taking temporary shelter under the leaves, when they may easily be caught and dealt with according to discretion. I have caught many bushels of them in this way in my garden, and I now find it pays me well to use the same trap on a large scale on my farm.

Cheap Wash for Cottages of Wood.

The following wash is recommended for the outside of wooden cottages, barns, outbuildings, fences, &c., where economy is important:

Take a clean barrel that will hold water. Put in it a half bushel of fresh quicklime, and slack it by pouring over it boiling water sufficient to cover it four or five inches deep, and stirring it till slacked.

When quite slacked, dissolve in water and add two pounds of sulphate of zinc, (white vitriol,) which may be had of any of the druggists, and which, in a few weeks, will cause the whitewash to harden on the wood-work. Add sufficient water to bring it to the consistence of thick whitewash. The wash is, of course, white, and as white is a color which we think should never be used except on buildings a good deal surrounded by trees, so as to prevent its glare, we would make it a fawn or drab color before using it.

To make the wash a pleasing cream color, add four pounds of yellow ochre.

For a fawn color, take four pounds umber, one pound Indian red, and one half pound lampblack.

To make the wash gray or stone color, add one pound raw umber, and two pounds lampblack.

The wash may be put on with a common whitewash brush, and will be found much more durable than common whitewash, as the sulphate of zinc sets or hardens the wash.

A FUGITIVE HAGAR.—A gentleman from Cincinnati has just related an incident which is worth recording. Coming up from Sandusky, he observed on board the boat a colored girl, or young woman, with a little child that was nearly white. A plainly-dressed gentleman came on board the boat with them, and our friend rather thought he might be her husband; for, though dark, she was quite pretty. The man was white. At Malden the man went on shore, but the woman remained on board till a colored citizen of Malden asked her if she was not a fugitive slave. She answered in the affirmative, and immediately followed him ashore. Our informant, observing this, followed them, and inquired the particulars, which she readily related. She had been the property of a young man in Covington, Ky., to whom she was wife as well as slave. He was the father of her child, and was very kind to her. He went to California, and left her behind at Covington. Subsequently he returned, and told her he was going again to California, and should take her with him. She was a little afraid of this new arrangement. She would willingly remain with him there; but she would not go to California willingly. He threatened to sell her to a trader, but she did not believe he would do it. It soon came to her ears, however, that she had been sold; and that her former master was preparing to leave for California with her child, and she was to go down the river. Like Eliza Harris, she would remain where she was, contented, with her child; but, like Mrs. Stowe's heroine, she would do and dare anything rather than be separated from her child. That night she crossed the river; and here she was now, in a land undefiled by chattel slavery—a free woman.

SOWING GARDEN SEEDS IN AUTUMN.—The practice of sowing the seeds of hardy vegetables for early Spring use at such a time of year that they shall make considerable growth before winter, has been practiced with great success by some gardeners, particularly for lettuce, early cabbage, early onions, spinach, &c. Much of the success of some of these vegetables consists in getting a sufficiently good and vigorous growth before winter. But it often happens that the soil is suffering from the severe autumn droughts at the best time for sowing. J. Towers, a skillful English gardener, pursues the following method, which, if found useful in that humid climate, would doubtless be of much greater advantage under our parching sun. He first thoroughly soaks with a fine rose watering-pot the entire space to be seeded—this is done at sunset, and the surface covered with mats all night, and until late the next afternoon, when the watering and covering is again repeated, and so on for three successive days. By this time the soil is brought to a fine, friable, quite moist condition, when the drills are drawn, a watering given along each, the seed then sown and covered with the screened earth. Every good seed will grow without failure, and with no appearance of the unevenness so common with dry weather sowing. Superficial watering, as is commonly practiced at this season, is perfectly futile, and soaking the seed merely will be of little use.

MONUMENT TO FRANKLIN.—The Chattanooga Advertiser proposes to erect a monument to Benj. Franklin, the Printer, and says:—

This monument should be erected by the Press. Long neglected by corporations, societies, and the like, let the Press commence the work, and it will erect a noble shaft, by adopting the following plan: Every paper published weekly only, give one dollar; every semi-weekly, two dollars; every tri-weekly, three dollars; and every daily, six or seven dollars, according to the number of issues each week. Monthlies and irregular issues pay acordingly, but nothing less than a dollar received from a newspaper publisher. This plan would raise ten or twenty thousand dollars in the Union.

VARIETY.

Henderson, the actor, was seldom known to be in a passion. When at Oxford, he was one day debating with a fellow student, who, not keeping his temper, threw a glass of wine in the actor's face; when Henderson took out his handkerchief, wiped his face and coolly said, "That, sir, was a digression; now for the argument."

The remark was once made to Moore, the poet, that it was supposed his verses slipped off his tongue as if by magic; and a passage of great ease was quoted. "Why, sir," Moore replied, "that line cost me hours, days, and weeks of attrition before it would come."

George Selwyn once affirmed in company, that no woman ever wrote a letter without a postscript. "My next letter shall refute you!" said Lady G. Selwyn soon after received a letter from her ladyship, when after her signature stood:—"P. S.—Who is right now, you or I?"

THE BIBLE IN OUR COMMON SCHOOLS.

Number Nine.

BY C. ROLLIN BURDICK, A. B.

Stationed as our nation is, with the full blaze of gospel light and liberty shining upon us, and enjoying prosperity to an eminent degree, we are called upon to hold up the torch of truth to enlighten other and less favored nations. Our land should become a land of missionaries. We should send forth men to evangelize the world, to teach the arts and sciences to unfortunate heathens. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," comes home to us with peculiar force; the more so, as we have received more of God's favors than other people. A hundred missionaries, and a thousand school-teachers, should be abroad from our land, blessing the world, where now there is one. The openings which Providence has made in China, India, and Africa, call aloud to Christian America for a fresh supply of laborers. Are our people ready to respond? Are they prepared for this work as they should be? Nay, verily. Our nation make more heathen than they convert. Our slavery and license systems, there is reason to fear, damn more souls than are saved by the united missionary labors of the whole American Church. This affords another reason for the more extensive use of the Bible in the education of children.

I might speak of our commercial relations with other nations, and many other things which are highly interesting; but the time approaches when I must bring my somewhat extended remarks to a focus. I will now answer some of the objections which are sometimes brought against the use of the Bible in our schools.

The first and chief objection is the existence of the different religious sects in most school districts. They are unwilling to have their children instructed in any tenets but their own, and if the Bible is used as a text-book, the teacher would be likely to impress upon his pupils his own peculiar religious notions, whatever might be the faith of the parents. This would create jealousies, and defeat the purposes for which our schools are organized. This objection seems at first view somewhat plausible; but the conclusion is drawn from wrong premises. In the first place, it is perfectly right that the different denominations should be unwilling to have their children instructed in any faith but their own. But it by no means necessarily follows, that such would be the result of introducing the Bible as a text-book and classic into our schools, The points of difference between evangelical denominations are of minor importance, and could be omitted by the teacher. In other words, the teacher need not introduce any sectarian teachings. The much-mooted points of difference can be left in the back-ground, to be impressed by other hands. To illustrate, the duty of baptism could be urged, without alluding to the mode, leaving that for the pupils' religious teachers; and so of many other things. Thank God, the different churches occupy common ground enough to engage the whole attention of the teacher in this department of his labor. The great and glorious truths of the Bible, which all the churches hold to, could and ought to be impressed upon the mind of youth by the usually powerful hand of the teacher. The doctrine of the fall of man, without meddling with questions about partial and total, physical and moral depravity, and the consequent need of a redeemer and mediator between man and the avenger of a just but violated law, should be made familiar to the youthful mind, from the earliest dawn of reason. The doctrines of repentance and faith in Christ, as the only means of salvation, should early be learned by youth. Their relations to God as their creator and preserver, to men as their brethren, and to Christ as their redeemer, and the duties and responsibilities growing out of these relations, should be made familiar to every immortal mind. The evidences of Christianity should be presented with all their illustrations, power, and incorruptible truthfulness, to shield from the gloomy shades of thrice-gloomy infidelity. All these points, and many more, might be thoroughly taught without interfering with any denominational differences.

Another objection, urged by many, is that it has a tendency to familiarize the mind too much with sacred things; or, in other words, it makes sacred things too common. This is absurd, and very unprotestant ground. We might as well talk of being too familiar with the vital breath of heaven, for we might as well expect that animal life could flourish without it, as that the soul could live in health without this bread of heaven. I am satisfied —and I hope I may not be charged with a want of charity—that this objection never would have been raised by one who feels the spirit of the Bible warming his inmost soul, glowing upon the altar of his heart, and welling up from the lowest depths of his being into his daily life.

Another objection might be urged, viz., it is not the intention for common schools to do this work. They are organized to train the intellectual faculties, not the moral. Verily; but it ought to be, and no school should be organized without a due reference to the moral as well as the intellectual training of youth. It may be urged as an objection, that it would be infringing upon the sphere of the church. Truly; then let us tear down the family, because it is a most powerful agency in accomplishing the work which the church was mainly organized to do. It may be said that the church is sufficient without the aid of schools. Facts prove the contrary. The church is a most potent engine in the elevation of man, is a blessed institution, has done an incalculably glorious work, and I would speak of her with reverence and thankfulness to God for His gift of her; but the subjects upon which she works are exceedingly depraved, and she needs all the aid she can have from subsidiary agents. The ministry of the gospel is more especially directed to adults, and it therefore leaves the young in a measure unprovided for. To supply this deficiency is what I am laboring for. The fact that thousands and millions within the pale of church influence are yearly dying unconverted, shows that the labors of the church are not all-triumphant. Until they become so, this objection is baseless.

But here, says the objector, I have you now; Sabbath-Schools and Bible-Classes are designed to meet this deficiency; and how gloriously they have done their work, let their numerous triumphs testify. Truly, the Sabbath-School has achieved many glorious victories; yet its work is limited. Thousands of children, who resort to our public schools, are never brought into our Sabbath-Schools, and are comparatively uninstructed in the Bible. I would have these reached and benefitted. But further, weekly lessons are not so likely to be remembered as daily, and when a thing is made a daily business, we are much more likely to gain an interest in it.

Again, it may be objected, that the want of vital piety in teachers forbids it in many instances. It is said, we must employ teachers who are not professors, because we cannot get a supply without. In answer to this I say, that no person should venture upon the business of teaching, with unsanctified intellect. He is unprepared for his task. He enters upon relations which are attended with startling, I had almost said frightful, responsibilities; and O, how can that teacher stand in judgment, who has by his example been instrumental in blighting one tender plant born for immortality, by preventing it from leaning upon the bosom of Jesus for protection and safety from the withering blasts of temptation.

> "O, let not their unskillful hands attempt
> To play the harp whose tones, whose living tones,
> Are left forever in its strings. Better far
> That Heaven's lightnings blast his very soul.
> And sink it back to chaos' lowest depths,
> Than knowingly, by word or deed, to send
> A blight upon the trusting mind of youth."

I will now present a synopsis of the arguments heretofore used, and bid adieu to my readers for the present, intending that if this is well received to present them with AN ESSAY UPON UNIVERSAL PEACE, as soon as my other duties will permit, either in the columns of the Recorder, or in some other form.

I first urged the use of the Bible as a text-book in our Common Schools for its importance as a history, it being the most interesting history published, abounding in the richest scenes ever portrayed by the pen. The style of the Bible writings commends it, being unexcelled in symplicity, beauty, and clearness. I have argued that the oratory of the Bible is full and powerful, outrivaling every thing else of the kind—that its poetry is grand, glorious, and soul-entrancing—that in themes for the poet and orator, it is surprisingly rich—and that in grandeur and sublimity its descriptions are enrapturing beyond the power of expression. I have dwelt at some length upon the glorious moral teachings of the Bible, showing what the world was without it, what it is with it, and what it is likely to gain from it. I have endeavored to impress upon the minds of parents the necessity of giving their children a more thorough moral training, by reciting some of the too numerous instances of unsanctified human intellect, cursing the world, causing rivers of blood and tears to flow, and corrupting and damning man by its literary productions. I was led unresistably to the conclusion, that if we would not raise any more Napoleon Bonapartes, we must give more attention to moral training in our systems of education. By contrasting the state of society among the ancient civilized nations with that of modern times, I have been able to show a vast preponderance in favor of the Bible. Reasoning from what it has done, the conclusion has become evident, that it is adequate to eradicate all the evils that curse humanity—to shame profanity to death—to cure drunkenness, "blast rumsellers," and restore peace and comfort to the unfortunate—to burn out the foul gangrene of licentiousness which is gnawing so fearfully at the vitals of society —to break up the horrible system of human slavery, that curse of curses, that sum of all villanies, by striking at its root, and save our country from impending ruin—to correct the erroneous notions which so many have formed upon religion and politics, and to cure the evils of sectarianism. I have shown its power to keep in check the spirit of avariciousness which holds so prominent a place among Americans, and seems to be hardening their hearts, and blinding them to all sense of moral right—to protect our nation from the unholy clutches of Anti-Christ, and from all kinds of despotism—to prepare us as a nation to take a proper stand among sister nations, and to use our power on the side of right, and to make us what we ought to be, a nation of missionaries. I have shown that these glorious results can be brought about by working upon the minds of the young, and that our public schools are the best places for doing this, when properly conducted. I appeal to my fellow teachers—brothers, am I not right? Have I not told the truth in my homely way? I am confident that you will answer, Yea. Christian ministers, what think ye of my doctrines? Do you object to the teacher's doing a part of the work usually assigned to yourselves? I think you will answer, Nay. I appeal to parents, guardians, and all. If the Bible is able to do so much for man—if our children have not been thoroughly enough instructed in it, and there is so much danger in neglect, both to them and our institutions—how ought we to labor and pray for a more universal dissemination of Bible doctrines. Let us not then neglect this glorious book, but let us scatter its benign influence all over the world; and let us not rest content until we every where see the Bible in the parlor, the Bible in the kitchen, the Bible in the dining room, the Bible in the work-shop, the Bible in the mines, the Bible in the halls of legislation, the Bible in our steamboats, the Bible in our railroad cars, the Bible in the sacred desk, and THE BIBLE IN OUR COMMON SCHOOLS.

SHILOH, N. J., Sept. 11, 1853.

"I AM A LOST MAN!"

The newspapers inform us that these were the last words of Bugeaud, Marshal of France, and Duke of Isly. When he uttered them, he was just closing a brilliant, many would say a useful life. He had led vast armies to battle. He had governed extensive States. He had been conspicuous in the councils of nations. The President of France made anxious visits to his death-chamber. The stern Cavaignac wept as he looked upon the dissolving frame of his old comrade; and the Convention was profoundly affected when the news of his death was announced. With all this accumulation of honor, he was, by his own confession, "a lost man." How mournful the contrast between the glory of his life and the deep gloom of its close!

From the same source we learn that Bugeaud had a pious mother. In the history of his eventful life, this seems to have been the only quarter in which good influence was exerted upon his heart. His mother's voice alone warned him of his danger, and spoke to him of eternity; all other influences led him astray. In the camp he heard of God only in blasphemy. In civil life he saw nothing but a desperate struggle for earthly place and power. In the saloons of Paris he heard wit mocking, and philosophy denouncing the religion of his youth. The quiet voice that had warned him, and prayed with him, was, alas for him! overborne and lost in the midst of these babbling voices of the world.

In the hour of death, however, these voices die away and are forgotten. The acclamations of a world could not have made the failing pulse of Bugeaud beat faster. Other tones were in his ears; for the accents we will not listen to when they admonish us, we are often forced to listen to when they accuse. The dying moments are often the time of resurrection for abused privileges and neglected gifts. They "stalk forth from the burial place of memory," to foreshadow our doom, and to convince us of its undeniable justice.

Thus we explain that fearful expression that fell from the dying warrior. He heeded a voice which he had long neglected and forgotten. Across the waste of years, through the storm of battle, it comes clear and distinct upon his failing ear. It asks for the fruit of early counsel; it asks for the result of pious care and zeal. One comprehensive glance over his life satisfies the man that he has wasted it. His own conscience condemns him. In this he knows that he but anticipates the sentence of God, and he sinks into death, "a lost man."

The lesson of this sad incident is easily read. It is only another instance of the ease with which carelessness can turn our best blessings into curses. A mother's love and a mother's pious care are inestimable gifts of God's mercy. Indifference and impenitence can make them causes of our deeper damnation, and so change the soft voice that sung our young infancy to sleep, that it will haunt our dying pillow with accusations that we can neither gainsay nor resist.

[Rev. M. B. Grier.

THE DEATH OF JUDAS.

In Matt. 27 : 5, it is said that Judas, after having brought his money and thrown it down in the temple, went and hanged himself. Objectors have represented this statement as inconsistent with that in Acts 1. 18, where he is said to "have purchased a field with the reward of iniquity, and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst and all his bowels gushed out." But these passages do not necessarily contradict each other. Matthew does not say that Judas, after having hanged himself, did not fall to the ground, nor, on the contrary, does Luke say that Judas did not hang himself before he fell to the ground; and unless the writers afterwards affirm the reality of the events which they respectively mention in such a way as to assert or imply that if the one event be true the other must be false, it is obvious that they do not contradict each other. Of the precise relation of the two events in question to each other, we have no information, and can affirm nothing with certainty. Some intermediate circumstance connected the one with the other as parts of the same transaction, but that circumstance has not been recorded. It is conjectured that Judas may have hung himself on the edge of a precipice near the valley of Hinnom, and that the rope breaking by which he was suspended, he fell to the earth and was dashed to pieces. As I stood in this valley and looked up to the rocky heights which hung over it on the south side of Jerusalem, I felt that the proposed explanation was a perfectly rational one; I was more than ever satisfied with it. I measured the precipitous, almost perpendicular walls, in different places, and found the height to be variously forty, thirty-six, thirty-three, thirty, and twenty-five feet. Olive trees still grow quite near the edge of these rocks, and anciently no doubt these and other trees were still more numerous in the same place. At the bottom of these precipices are also rocky ledges on which a person would fall from above, and in that case not only would life be destroyed, but the body almost inevitably bruised and mangled.

MAN.

BY GEORGE HERBERT.

Hark! how the birds do sing,
And woods do ring!
All creatures have their joy; and man hath his.
Yet, if we rightly measure,
Man's joys and pleasure,
Rather hereafter than the present is.

To this life, things of sense
Make their pretense;
In th' other, angels have a right by birth;
Man ties them both, alone,
And makes them one—
With th' one hand touching heaven, with th' other, earth.

In soul he mounts and flies;
In flesh he dies.
He wears a stuff, whose thread is coarse and round,
But trimmed with curious lace;
And should take place
After the trimming, not the stuff and ground.

Not that he may not here
Taste of the cheer;
But, as birds drink, and straight lift up their heads,
So must he sip, and think
Of better drink
He may attain to, after he is dead.

But as his joys are double,
So is trouble.
He hath two winters; other things, but one.
Both frosts and thoughts do nip
And bite his lip;
And he, of all things, tears two deaths alone.

Yet even the greatest griefs
May be reliefs,
Could he but take them right; and in their ways,
Happy is he, whose heart
Hath found the art
To turn his double pains to double praise.

LIFE IN AFRICA.

The following passage from a new work entitled "Abbeokuta, or Sunrise within the Tropics," gives a graphic and interesting account of life in the Kingdom of Yoruba, a country lying inland from the Bight of Benin, and stretching from two to three hundred miles in length, and nearly the same in breadth.

For many miles from the coast, the country, though fertile, is low and swampy; but as you journey on toward the interior, it becomes diversified with hill and plain; and, from the descriptions given of it by the Landers, as well as by our own missionaries, it must be very picturesque and beautiful. Deep and fertile valleys lie among the hills; granite rocks, some lofty, bold, and bare, others clothed with trees or verdure to their summits; and clear streams, tumbling over their rocky bed, add to the beauty of the scenery.

The appearance of the towns, from a distance, is often imposing; the walls enclose a large extent of land, and fields and trees are interspersed among the thatched roofs of the lowly dwellings. It is strange, that in a tropical climate the natives should take such pains to exclude the air; but the African hut, like that of the Hindoo, is without windows or any opening but the low door, while the roof projects so far beyond the walls, that but little air can find its way even here. The houses of the better classes are built round a quadrangle, into which the separate dwellings open, while a rude piazza runs along the whole interior. The head of the family occupies the largest of these dwellings, and round him are gathered children and grandchildren, and any other members of his family for whom a separate habitation can be found. The court in the centre is often planted, and is the common place of resort for all the inmates, where, shut in among themselves, they can, without fear of interruption, talk over any subject of family interest; and where, on the bright moonlight nights of that southern clime, the whole party are frequently collected. Here they will remain for hours, seated on the ground, and listening with fixed attention, while one and another relates some passing incident, or amuses his hearers with some legend or fairy tale, of which these people are passionately fond. It is the hour of calm enjoyment, and the eye of even a Christian Yoruban will glisten at the thought of these moonlight scenes, though now his conversation would be of a higher and holier tone.

The people are industrious, and the soil freely yields them yams, cassada, and the various other grains that are in use among them. Cotton, too, is grown in considerable quantities, and the women spin, and men and women weave it into cloth which is worn by all. They are generally well clothed in this their native manufacture; the color is often blue, dyed with indigo, and checked with red cotton procured from Haussa, and which, it is said, is naturally of that color. There is a great taste for dress among them, and independently of any religious motive, some of the gay young men affect the Mahometan costume, and wear wide sack-like trowsers, much embroidered, and confined close round the ankle, with a loose upper garment, and turban; or if unable to procure this last appendage, they roll a long piece of cotton round the head. Some of them are beginning to adopt the English dress; but all this is to be regretted, as any change of national costume necessarily involves some degree of change in the national character, and their present dress is very becoming.

Knives, axes, and implements of husbandry are made from the iron ore, which is very abundant, and which they have learnt to smelt. Osier baskets and grass mats are also among their native manufactures. The red earthenware in common use is made by women, and burnt by being stacked together, with layers of wood between the rows, as bricks are baked in England. One of their most useful domestic utensils has been provided for them by nature—this is the calabash, a kind of pumpkin. When the fruit begins to ripen, a hole is cut in the small end to admit the air, and thus the pulp decays without injuring the rind. Sometimes the incision is made round the fruit, at about one-third from the smaller end, and a vessel with a neatly fitting lid is produced without further trouble These calabashes are of various sizes, some are smaller than a teacup, while others will hold three or four gallons.

A good deal of internal traffic is carried on among them; markets are held morning and evening in every town and village, and in the towns there is a larger one every fifth day, which is attended by all the neighborhood. Their only current money is the white cowry, forty of which are the value of an English penny. They are strung and tied up in "heads," as they are called, each head containing 2,000 shells, equal to 4s. 2d., and at this rate of reckoning, we shall not be surprised at £2 or £3 worth being as much as a man can carry, nor wonder at the expense and difficulty of conveying money from Badagry to Abbeokuta.

One of their domestic habits is, we believe, peculiar to themselves. None of the people take their first morning meal in their own houses, but all, both men and women, about 7 o'clock in the morning, pay a visit to the cook's shop, and make their first breakfast on a bowl of gruel of Indian corn. The women then proceed to the market to purchase materials for a more substantial repast, which is taken about 10 o'clock. This consists of balls of Indian corn, called "denge," served up in a kind of strong sauce made of beef, mutton, fish or fowl, with various vegetables, and seasoned with salt procured from the Popos, and with Cayenne pepper, which grows in the country; the whole forming a very nutritous and palatable food. The family do not generally collect together for this meal, but each one takes it when so inclined. In cases, however, where there is only one wife, she and her children usually join the husband and any friends he may have invited. When about to partake of the food, a large earthen bowl is placed on the ground, containing the denge and the sauce, and the party sit down round it. The balls of Indian corn are taken out of the bowl, broken and distributed to the different persons, each of whom dips his portion into the sauce as he eats it. There is a good deal of animal food consumed in this way, but it is never eaten solid. One of their chief articles of food is also the yam.

DR. DODDRIDGE'S DREAM.

Dr. Doddridge was on terms of very intimate friendship with Dr. Samuel Clarke, and in religious conversation they spent many happy hours together. Among other matters, a very favorite topic was the intermediate state of the soul, and the probability that at the instant of dissolution it was not introduced into the presence of all the heavenly hosts, and the splendors around the throne of God. One evening after a conversation of this nature, Dr. Doddridge retired to rest with his mind full of the subject discussed, and in the "visions of the night," his ideas were shaped into the following beautiful form:—

He dreamed he was at the house of a friend, when he was suddenly taken dangerously ill. By degrees he seemed to grow worse, and at last to expire. In an instant he was sensible that he exchanged the prison house and sufferings of mortality for a state of liberty and happiness. Embodied in a splendid aerial form, he seemed to float in a region of pure light. Beneath him lay the earth, but not a glittering city or village, the forest or the sea, was visible. There was naught to be seen below, save the melancholy group of friends, weeping around his lifeless remains.

Himself thrilled with delight, he was surprised at their tears, and attempted to inform them of his change, but by some mysterious power, utterance was denied; and as he anxiously leaned over the mourning circle, gazing fondly upon them, and struggling to speak, he rose silently upon the air; their forms became more and distant, and gradually melted away from his sight. Reposing upon golden clouds he found himself swiftly mounting the skies, with a venerable figure at his side guiding his mysterious movement, and in whose countenance he remarked the lineaments of youth and age were blended together with an intimate harmony and majestic sweetness. They traveled through a vast region of empty space, until at length the battlements of a glorious edifice shone in the distance, and as its form rose brilliant and distinct among the far off shadows that flittered across their path, the guide informed him that the palace he beheld was for the present to be his mansion of rest. Gazing upon its splendor he replied, that while on earth he had heard that "eye had not seen, nor had the ear heard, nor could it enter into the heart of man to conceive the things which God had prepared for those who love him;" but notwithstanding the building to which they were then rapidly approaching was superior to any thing he had ever before seen, yet its grandeur had not exceeded the conceptions he had formed. The guide made no reply—they were already at the door, and entered.

The guide introduced him into a spacious apartment, at the extremity of which stood a table covered with a snow-white cloth, a golden cup, and a cluster of grapes; and there he said he must remain, for he would receive in a short time a visit from the Lord of the mansion, and that during the interval before his arrival, the apartment would furnish him sufficient entertainment and instruction. The guide vanished, and he was left alone. He began to examine the decorations of the room, and observed the walls were adorned with a number of pictures. Upon near inspection, he found, to his astonishment, that they formed a complete biography of his own life. Here he saw upon the canvas angels, though unseen, had ever been his familiar attendants, and, sent by God, they had sometimes preserved him from immediate peril. He beheld himself first as an infant just expiring, when his life was prolonged by an angel gently breathing into his nostrils. Most of the occurrences here delineated were perfectly familiar to his recollection, and unfolded many things which he had never before understood, and which had perplexed him with many doubts and much uneasiness. Among others, he was particularly struck with a picture in which he was represented as falling from his horse, when death would have been inevitable, had not an angel received him in his arms, and broken the force of his descent. The merciful interpositions of God filled him with joy and gratitude, and his heart overflowed with love as he surveyed in them all an exhibition of goodness and mercy far beyond all that he had imagined. Suddenly his attention was arrested by a rap at the door. The Lord of the mansion had arrived—the door opened, and he entered. So powerful and so overwhelming, and withal of such singular beauty was his appearance, that he sank down at his feet, completely overcome by his majestic presence. His Lord gently raised him from the ground, and, taking his hands, led him forward to the table. He pressed with his finger the juice of the grapes into the cup, and, after having drank himself, presented it to him, saying, "This is the new wine in my Father's kingdom." No sooner had he partaken, then all uneasy sensations vanished. Perfect love had cast out fear, and he conversed with his Saviour as an intimate friend. Like the silver rippling of the summer sea, he heard fall from his lips the grateful approbation: "Thy labors are over, thy work is approved, rich and glorious is thy reward." Thrilled with an unspeakable bliss, that glided into the very depth of his soul, he suddenly saw glories upon glories, bursting upon his view. The Doctor awoke. Tears of rapture from his joyful interview were rolling down his cheeks. Long did the lively impressions of this charming dream remain upon his mind, and never could he speak of it without emotions of joy and tenderness.

A JEWISH CONVERT.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Observer gives the following account of a Jewish convert in Germany:—

Simon Posner was born in 1805, at Aurus, a small town of Lower Silesia. His parents, who regarded all Jewish customs as sacred, accustomed the child to practice prayer, and the external duties of religion. He was then sent successively to schools in Breslau, Berlin, and Koenigsberg, to receive a liberal education. There becoming acquainted with some pious persons, he asked for Christian baptism, and resolved to study theology, under the care of the celebrated professor Neander, author of an excellent Church History.

When Posner's parents learned his change of religion, they were deeply afflicted. The father wept, according to the directions of the Talmud, for his son as dead; he took off his shoes, his clothes, and remained for hours stretched upon the ground, singing funeral songs. The young man resolved, still, to become reconciled with his family, and came home at the Jewish Feast of Expiations. What an interview! The father trembled in all his limbs, and his mouth could not utter a word. The son kept motionless before him, his eyes bathed in tears. Then, these words escaped his trembling lips: "My father, forgive, forgive me. God, our Father, has willed it thus. I am now your true son! my constant love shall prove it." The mother embraced her son weeping; for though she had decided to cast him off, she had not the courage. She only said, "My son, why have you done this?" The father then sobbed, and in a voice mingled with sighs, he said: "According to the Law, I must mourn for you as a dead person; and yet, my dear son, you are alive, and I love you still. May God forgive you the evil you have done us, as I forgive you myself!"

Posner had the joy of being reconciled with his parents before quitting them. He studied yet two years at Berlin, and sought then to gain an honest livelihood. He was a pastor; but for some time remained without tasting the joys of gratuitous pardon in Christ, crucified. His eyes were at last fully opened, and all his discourses and labors had no other object than to lead sinners to the God of the Gospel. "I spoke from a full heart," he said, "and soon an audience gathered around me eager to hear the good news of salvation. My preaching changed; I wrestled in prayer with the Lord; and without being stopped by the opinions of the world, I began to hold private meetings in which I expounded the Word of God; these were happy days—days of great blessing."

This faithful disciple of the Redeemer died in the full vigor of life. He had preached in the morning—in the afternoon he fell sick; eight days after he breathed his last. Praise and thanksgiving sanctified his last hours. "Be of good courage," he said to his wife, "the Lord will take my place with you, and we shall not be long separated."

ELOQUENT PASSAGE.

The following passage forms the conclusion of one of Prof. Upham's letters to the Congregationalist. The writer, who was then in Europe, had just described the hotel des Invalids, the magnificent resting-place of Napoleon, and the depository of many of the trophies of French valor. He continues:—

"As I returned from this place the sun was setting behind the distant hills. I passed through the majestic groves of the Elysian Fields. The autumnal leaves, gleaming in the departing radiance of day, fell around me. My heart went back to America. The sound of her rivers was in my ear. Her vast forests spread out before me. I remembered the vastness, the wilderness, the repose of nature, and I said to myself, 'These works which I have seen in foreign lands—the efforts and the memorials of genius—are still the works of man. Imperfection marks their origin; decay completes their progress. Beauty and deformity, life and death, are mingled together. Man is here; but where is the Maker of man?' I sigh for my native land. I wish to hear again the prayers and the hymns of her cottages, inspired by the blessings around them. Her rivers are her lines of beauty; her hills are her monuments; the mighty firmament is her cathedral; and God—heard in the sighing of the winds—seen in the richness of the forest—and eternal in the reproduction of her wild and varied magnificence—God is everywhere."

A cheerful spirit makes labor light and sleep sweet, and all around happy, which is much better than being only rich.

"DENOMINATIONAL SINS."

When Jeremiah prophesied evil to the Jews for their wickedness, there were those who accused him of weakening the hands of the people, in speaking such words to them, and declared that he sought not the welfare of the people, but their hurt. A similar state of things exists in the Seventh-day Baptist denomination. He who ventures to attack the abominations that obtain among us, exposing them in their true character, and declaring that God will have a controversy with us for these things, does so at his peril. He runs the risk of being denounced as a troubler of Israel. The insinuation is made, that he has no love for the denomination—that he is in reality its foe, and that his reproofs spring from any thing but a kindly spirit.

Some time ago, we undertook, in our editorial capacity, to animadvert upon certain inconsistencies of our people, conceiving it high time that some earnest measures were taken to awaken them from their guilty carelessness. We spoke plainly; but as God is witness, our desire was to do good. We meant to be understood, and we have reason to think that we were. The efforts of some to justify the practices which were brought under censure, and of others to gloss them over; the care taken by others, again, to hide their papers, lest the news should reach Gath, and the daughters of the uncircumcised should triumph; proved that we had touched a tender spot. Some, we are told, denounced our animadversions as "unjustifiable slander;" and others gravely thought that, though the things complained of were true, they should not have been thus publicly exposed.

As to the propriety of holding up such things to censure through the medium of the denominational paper, "doctors may differ." But it should be remembered, that this mode of censuring them does not make them public; they are already notorious. If a Seventh-day Baptist will take his seat in a car, or travel in a steamboat, on the Sabbath day, and so publish his own transgression to hundreds of people, what right has he to complain, or what right has any one to complain in his behalf, that the practice is afterward alluded to in the paper? As for slander, if we have been guilty of it, we think it must be on the principle of "the greater the truth, the greater the slander." We challenge any man to convict us of having given utterance to any thing but what was strictly true.

Our people have been, and still are, guilty of Sabbath-breaking to an alarming extent. We fear it is getting worse instead of better. We will not say how many instances of it have come to our knowledge within the last two months; but so many, that it made our cheeks tingle with shame, when we thought of the humiliating position our denomination was thereby placed in before the public. Attempting to reform the world; preaching at every street corner and in every high place, the necessity of the Sabbath; contending pertinaciously for the divine appointment of the seventh day of the week, and gravely telling others that in keeping God's commandments there is great reward; yet, whenever interest, or pleasure tempts, transgressing without scruple. Is there never to be an end to such things? Must we always appear to the world nothing better than a set of hypocrites? Who will, who can, believe that we set any value upon the Sabbatic Institution, while we make such a mock of it in practice?

Selfishness is at the bottom of all these transgressions. When brethren linger in New York all Sixth-day, knowing that the boat, or car, which is to convey them home, does not leave till about the time that Sabbath commences, the only fair and honest reason that can be assigned for it is, that self-interest will not let them quit business in time to get home before they have broken the commandment. One and two hours of the first part of the Sabbath, and in some instances the whole of Friday night, are consumed in journeying. And some cannot wait till the Sabbath is gone, before they must journey back again. And what is the excuse rendered for such conduct? 'O, our business is urgent.' Business! Did it ever occur to you, that the proper 'business' of man is to glorify God? And what right have you to be employed in any business, that calls for a violation of the Sabbath? If your business cannot be conducted without placing you under the necessity of breaking one of God's commandments, the sooner you have done with it, the better. But it is a mere pretense, that your business is so urgent. Be honest, and confess that you love the money which your business gains for you, better than you love the good which strict Sabbath-keeping would bring to the soul; for that is the truth of the matter. You deliberately make sale of the Sabbath—at least of a part of it, and you might as well of the whole, (see James 2: 10,) for so many dollars and cents. As plainly as you can, you say that money is your god, and the claims of the Creator must be waived, till the god which engrosses your affections is first served.

A person, once attempting to justify himself to Dr. Johnson for pursuing a dishonorable calling, said, "You know I must live." "I see no necessity for that," was the honest but blunt reply of the Doctor. And so, we say to any, and all of our brethren, who plead that they cannot make a living unless they break the Fourth Commandment. If you cannot, then starve. There is no necessity that you should live, unless you can live to the glory of God; nor ought you to desire life, or even health, except as the means of bringing glory to his name. But the pretext is hollow; there is nothing in it. All you mean by it is, that you cannot get rich, or cannot indulge in some of the luxuries that others do, unless you break the Sabbath. For, as to a mere living, God has promised it to those who trust in him, and do good. (See Ps. 37: 3, Matt. 6: 33, Heb. 13: 5.) But with a mere living you are determined not to be satisfied; you want more—you are determined to have more—and if your end cannot be accomplished as well by keeping the Sabbath, you will break it. But remember, that "the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them." Prov. 1: 32.

We had thought, that we would never write another line, nor preach another sermon, nor hold another argument, in favor of the Bible Sabbath, so long as our brethren would persist in such God-dishonoring practices. For why should we stand up to teach the people that the seventh day is the Sabbath, and that a blessing is in it, so long as our own people are practically giving the lie to all we can say? Possibly we may not adhere very strictly to this rule, but we must be permitted to say, that we have no faith in our denomination as an agency for promoting Sabbath reform, so long as the state of things we have complained of continues. But though we have said that whoever attacks the abominations prevailing among us, runs the risk of being denounced as a troubler of the camp, we are comforted in the assurance that there are some among us—indeed, we trust, a goodly number—who sigh and cry for these things.

Let no one misunderstand us. We do not suppose that our own denomination is one whit more ready to stone the prophets that are sent to them, than any other. In any denomination, he who makes battle with the inconsistencies he witnesses, must calculate upon receiving some reproach. With others, however, we have nothing to do. Our business is with our own brethren; we wish to do them good, and hence our plain, outspoken manner. We are not disposed to complain at the little reproach—it has been but little—that we have received; it has not hurt us, and we have no fear that it will. T. B. B.

SABBATH-KEEPERS IN PALESTINE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Since the letters from Palestine, which were inserted in the last two numbers of the Recorder respectively, were put into your hands for publication, I have received the following, for which I trust you will find room in your next number.

The first letter is from Mr. Thacher, who has been connected with the American company in Palestine for some time, and had devoted his energies to the benevolent work of our Sabbath-keeping friends in that country. I understand that Bro. Thacher will soon revisit the United States, having been offered a passage gratis by the Consul General at Beirut.

The second letter is from a Rabbi of some note, residing near Jaffa, though the main object of the communication is in relation to agricultural interests, yet it incidentally reflects some of those rays of kindness and confidence which are so extensively kindled in the sympathies of the children of Abraham. Though this letter was intended as a private one, I take the liberty of placing it at your disposal, believing it will be useful and instructive to the readers of the Recorder.

T. B. S.

PLAINS OF SHARON, near Jaffa,
July 5th, 1853.

DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST,—I received your letter some time since, and would now desire to say, in reply, that we are all very grateful for your Christian regard and timely assistance in the day of our affliction, and I would express our hearty thanks, not ceasing to pray to God for your reward in his heavenly kingdom. Before I received your letter, we had about given up the hope of being able farther to prosecute our work, on account of the violence and injustice we had met from Meshullam and his English friends. We sold every thing of furniture and clothing that we could spare, to supply our necessities with the greatest economy, reserving the half of our tools, which Mr. Smith, U. S. Consul, had secured for us, our seeds, etc., until the last. But when I received your letter, with the accompanying draft for £50, two hundred dollars of which was designated for our "common cause," it gave us new strength, and we yielded to the importunities of our poor Jewish friends to remain and make another attempt in their behalf. As soon as our decision was known, we were visited by some of their principal men and rabbis, who expressed their decided approbation and their sympathy with us, and offered us as many men to labor with us as we should need, stating that if the individuals they recommended should prove insufficient, we must dismiss them, and they would supply their places with others. By our last year's fiery trial in Artas, we have learned much—more probably than by a longer residence in quiet dependence on the advice and agency of others.

Early in March I visited Jaffa, hoping then that I might find a refuge for our family at this distance from Jerusalem, the seat of Mission jealousy. I found that land was to be obtained in Jaffa much cheaper than in Artas, and also that the soil here is much better and more easily worked. So, immediately after receiving your letter, we leased our present place here, and on the 1st of June removed, in company with two industrious Jews from Jerusalem. We find every encouragement that we can desire. We have a comfortable house, large enough for ourselves and the two Jewish families; also as much land as we can work, in good order, with plenty of fruit, such as oranges, and pomgranates, with water drawn for us and supplied to our hand every other day, for 2,000 piasters, or about $90 per annum. It was late in the season to begin, but we were free from the constant abuse and profanity of a passionate, unprincipled superintendent, and we began in earnest. The Jews worked with great enthusiasm, as they are to have their share in the produce. The idea of raising their own food as their fathers had once done, inspired them with a new zeal, and if ever you saw a happy family, it is ours at the present time. On the third and fourth day after planting corn, beans, melons, cucumbers, radishes and tomatoes were up, to the surprise and delight of our new laborers. A German owns the land, and having become acquainted with us and our faith while we lived in Jerusalem, he commenced keeping the Sabbath with us the first week after we came, so that the mules which draw the water had rest, and we had the new and great pleasure of not only keeping the Sabbath ourselves, but of having our land and laborers and animals all rest. We have had a severe experience, and from necessity have been driven to manage and interpret for ourselves with Arabs, Turks, Jews, and oriental Christians, who are all jealous of each other, and we need much wisdom and patience to pass kindly between them, when there is any business or interest at stake. But according to our great trouble has been the blessed mercy of our God, who had helped and encouraged us to go forward in the midst of all our troubles, with a good prospect of success.

We have found much favor with different parties in Jaffa, especially among the Jews, whose principal rabbi exerts himself to serve us. We have several good German neighbors, who offer us any assistance in their power, having all along sympathized with us in our persecutions, as they once worked with Meshullam, "but could not live with him," and knew his fraud and profanity in their own case. Beside the owner of our land, another of their number, a young man of intelligence and piety has also commenced keeping the Sabbath, and has met with us the last three weeks. If we had a number of your best tracts translated into German, they would be of good service here. Three pious men have just arrived from Germany, wishing to engage in farming; but they, like ourselves, have small means, and this is no more than we might expect, that the rich in this world would not be willing to make the sacrifice. They are expecting to lease a biarah (or garden) near us, and also seek the good of this land. The great thing in this fertile soil, and fine climate, is to secure plenty of water, to make it truly like the gardens of the Lord. Here in Jaffa wells are easily dug, through a soft, porous under-strata of rock, saving much labor in stoning them up. Water is found on an average from 20 to 30 feet in abundance. If we only had the old-fashioned wind-mill power, that I think is still used in some parts of the United States for raising salt water for salt making, what a great improvement it would be to the heavy wheels and earthen jars moved by mules, in bringing up water here. The natives are fast improving in their cultivation, and hundreds of their gardens in this neighborhood would be ready to adopt any such aid, and pay well for its construction. We need some enterprising American to come and make one for a sample, which great improvement could thus be introduced for a small expense, which would extend indefinitely, for much good to this land. One thing in our favor on the plains of Sharon is that the rain commences much earlier here than it does on the mountains; and droves of cattle pasture well all the year round, while in Artas our cattle must be fed seven months in the year. The Jews appear to have a sincere regard for us, and express an increasing desire to engage in farming. As they formerly quoted the Talmud against manual labor, now they begin to quote it in favor of our work; thus "all the study of the Law, without some handicraft, will prove futile." My faith was never so firm as now, that God is turning his hand again for good to this land and the people of Israel, and my desire to do all I can to coöperate in the humblest way, increases the longer I stay, notwithstanding all we have sacrificed and suffered by leaving our own happy country. The prospect of practical usefulness was never so plain and great.

A Jaffa merchant came with the President of the Jews to see us yesterday. His business leads him often into the interior, in various directions, to buy cargoes for his vessels. He said the crops were never so fine as this year, all produce being more abundant, better in quality, and cheaper. He ships cotton, wheat, sesame, seed, and oil. He said that the shipping of produce has greatly increased here of late. Some five or six years ago only about five or six French vessels came in a year; but their number has increased every year, until this year there has been between forty and fifty, beside the increase with England, Italy, and Greece.

A report came to Jaffa yesterday, that the Arabs have become so dissatisfied with Meshullam that they have driven him and his family away, and he is now in Jerusalem. I don't know what steps Mr. Finn and he will take next, to ensnare benevolent people. The Lord sees, and he will preserve those who trust in him.

We were surprised last week by a visit from Mr. Warder Cresson on his way to Jerusalem. He remained two nights, and expressed much satisfaction at the situation of the Jews with us, and the flourishing condition of our cultivation—does not object to our plan, and proposes to begin a similar experiment near Jerusalem.

Dear brother, we beg your prayers, that our poor labor, though condemned by many, may be accepted of God. In our daily seasons of prayer, we also realize his presence and blessing, and feel to rejoice with praise and thanksgiving for his great mercy to his unworthy dust.

Your sincere brother in Christ,
CYRUS THACHER.

By the grace of God, I am going truly to say that I am the first of the Israelites who came here in Jaffa, (20 years ago,) one of the tribe of Dan. I have heard in the newspapers that the American company, God grant them a long life, wish to do good, and benefit the Israelites who are in this holy land, desiring to obtain the necessary things of life by cultivating the land. I began alone to cultivate, by planting a garden, as I am going to say to you, and if I could accomplish my ideas (by example) I would cause the other Jews to do the same. But it is known to every one, that the beginning of every new thing is very difficult, and all the Mahommedans were astonished at seeing a Jew cultivate the ground, therefore I have spent much money, and I have no more to go on with. A good part of my land which I bought, still remains uncultivated; to cultivate this ground, (from which many Jews might live,) it requires farther expenses, for which I have not means. Therefore I beg you, who want to do well to the Jews, to aid me to advance this work, and may God pay you. There are already here some Americans who want to do well to the Jews, that is Messrs. Charles Albert Minor & Co. But this is not sufficient without your help, therefore I ask your concurrence. I also make you know, that for the drawing of the water there are necessary three powerful mules, because the machine which brings up the water to water the garden is very big and very heavy, and without artifice; therefore there are many expenses for ropes, and barley for the mules, and one man to be present there always. For all these are necessary, every year, thirty pounds. I hear from the Americans who are here, that in your country there is a machine which takes out the water by the wind, or a pump driven by one man. They also saw my garden and well, and told me it was very corresponding to my well. As this would discharge me from such great expense, I pray you to send me one of these machines, and it will be a great present for me, and I hope I may have it in a short time. Whenever this machine will come, I can water four gardens, from which can live many Jewish men; and I except your answer. Now I am going to say to you what this garden contains—half an hour distant from Jaffa. Its length is about 1664 steps, and its breadth 1553 steps; near the road is the yard, about 34 steps in length and breadth, well fortified, with a great stone wall; on the north there are two small rooms, at the corner is the well which waters the garden, (the breadth is about 8 steps,) near it are two strong arches, 11 steps long, and 6 broad on the top, to build a house upon, and near it is the cistern. In the garden are the following trees: 150 citron trees, 1350 orange, 500 sweet lemon, 210 lemon trees, 500 apple, pear, apricot, and quince trees, 1200 mulberry trees, 100 almond trees, 50 date trees, 50 olive, figs, and grapes, 1200 pomgranate trees—altogether, 5310. Also a great piece of land remains without culture, and whenever you send me the machine I can do four gardens for Israelites.

The American company are now settled near Jaffa, in the neighborhood of my garden; they have Jews from Jerusalem laboring with them, who are industrious and pleased to learn agriculture; also others wish to learn, but cannot, for want of more means. I often visit them, and rejoice to see that they progress so well. They were near Jerusalem last year, and though they had great difficulty and opposition, they raised very good American produce and encouraged and helped our brethren in Judea. But in Jaffa there is much good land, and no opposition. I feel a great regard for them, and desire that my people in Jaffa should engage in this work. If good American friends will help us, I will do all I can to promote the learning of agriculture among my congregation of seventy families. All these are written by the Rabbi who remains here; he is the procurator of the Jews, who does prayers to God for you.

MOVEMENTS OF THE COLORED PEOPLE.

The Free People of Color held a Convention at Rochester, N. Y., in July last, to consider their present social condition, and devise ways to improve it. The Convention was at the time represented as well conducted and interesting—the speeches and deliberations generally evincing an amount of talent and culture which surprised many. The proceedings are now placed before the public in pamphlet form. In an extended and favorable notice of them, the N. Y. Tribune says:—

"The specific thing actually effected by the Convention is the appointment of a National Council of twenty members, two from each of the ten States represented, (the members for New York are Dr. J. McCune Smith of this City, and Frederick Douglass of Rochester,) to be increased hereafter by the election of additional members, in the proportion of one to five thousand of the colored population of each State, to be appointed by State Councils, which are themselves to be chosen by the vote of every colored inhabitant who shall pay ten cents as a poll tax. The most prominent purpose and duty of the National Council is the establishment of an Industrial College for the education of colored youth in the mechanic arts. Its immediate charge is assigned to a Committee of five, who are to constitute the Board of Trustees. There is also a Committee charged with the establishment of a Protective Union, with auxiliary branches, for the purchase and sale of articles of domestic consumption; a Committee of Business Relations, which is to establish and maintain an office for the registry of colored mechanics, artisans and business men throughout the Union, of all persons willing to employ colored men in business or to teach colored boys mechanical trades and farming, and of colored men and youth seeking employment or instruction; to report on any avenues of business which they may deem inviting to colored capital, skill or labor; and to receive for exhibition or sale products of the skill and labor of colored people; finally, a Committee on Publication. Each Committee is to have absolute control over its special department, and to fill vacancies, subject to the confirmation of the Council. In short, the object is the establishment of the appropriate exective departments of a general association of the freemen of color to develope their industrial power, and thus ameliorate their economic condition, as the necessary preliminary of their social elevation."

Besides the regular proceedings of the Convention, this pamphlet contains letters and documents which throw considerable light upon the condition of the colored people, and show what are the principal obstacles to their progress. In a letter from Frederick Douglass to Mrs. Stowe, after alluding to the fact that facilities for the education of colored people in common schools and in the higher professions, are improving, he says:—

"Prejudice against the free colored people in the United States, has shown itself nowhere so invincible as among mechanics. The farmer and professional man cherish no feeling so bitter as that cherished by these. The latter would starve us out of the country entirely. At this moment I can more easily get my son into a lawyer's office to study law, than I can into a blacksmith's shop to blow the bellows and to wield the sledge-hammer. Denied the means of learning useful trades, we are pressed into the narrowest limits to obtain a livelihood. In times past we have been the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for American society, and we once enjoyed a monopoly in menial employments, but this is so no longer—even these employments are rapidly passing out of our hands. The fact is (every day begins with the lesson and ends with the lesson) that colored men must learn trades—must find new employments, new modes of usefulness to society—or that they must decay under the pressing wants to which their condition is rapidly bringing them."

The letter of Frederick Douglass to Mrs. Stowe was written upon request for his opinion in regard to the best method in which she could permanently contribute to the improvement of the free blacks. It is understood that the money collected by her in Europe had this destination.

THE VIRGINIA ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Virginia Association met at New Milton, Doddridge County, Va., on the 2d day of September, 1853, at 12 o'clock. S. D. Davis preached the opening discourse from Cor. 13: 11.

T. E. Babcock and S. D. Davis were appointed a Committee to draft rules for the future regulation of the proceedings of the Association. Adjourned till First-day morning.

The report of the Committee for drafting Rules of Order was read and adopted.

Adjourned to meet at the call of the Moderator.

Met at 3 o'clock P. M. Prayer by E. Bee.

The Report on the State of Religion was read and adopted, as follows:—

Report on the State of Religion.

After viewing the apparent prospects of our denomination throughout our associational territory, it is with feelings of regret that your Committee would say, that the state of religion is far from being of that high and exalted character which we could wish, and seems to call loudly for a doubling of our diligence, to take higher ground in the cause of the blessed Redeemer. In order to give a more full idea of the general feelings ~~that seem to prevail,~~ we give extracts from the several church letters:—

Lost Creek—"We are favored with regular preaching by our beloved elder, at stated periods, once or twice a month, and are blessed with a good degree of peace and union amongst ourselves; yet we fear that such a state of apathy and lukewarmness prevails, that we do not possess all that Christian mindedness and spiritual power necessary to constitute such lights in the world as to make us truly efficient in the extension of our Redeemer's kingdom; yet, notwithstanding this comparative state of inactivity seems to pervade the body, we still hope that truth and vital piety is cultivated, and that a spitit of love for the blessed Redeemer and his glorious cause is progressing in the hearts of the members."

New Salem—"We desire with you to offer our devout acknowledgments for the favors bestowed upon us, although we do not appreciate those blessings as we should. We do not enjoy that flow of the spirit, as in days gone by, and beg an interest in the prayers of our associated brethren, that we may again be quickened in the inner man, and enabled to rejoice under the pleasing influence of God's holy spirit."

Middle Island—"Unpleasant as it is, we must tell you that the state of religious feeling and exercise is lamentably low with us, and there is not that union of sentiment in every particular that should exist, to render us as useful in the cause of our Lord and Master as we otherwise would be; yet we have a desire that the mist of error may be driven away by the eradicating influence of the gospel of peace."

Hughes' River—"Although we do not enjoy as much of the Divine grace of God as we believe to be our privilege, still we have reason to rejoice that love and unity remain with us, and an increasing desire for a thorough knowledge of the word of God."

Resolved, That we tender our thanks to the Western Association, for the help they have granted us in sending a delegate to sit with us in our deliberations, and anxiously solicit a continuance of their co-operation.

Resolved, That we commend the school at West Union to the confidence of the people within the bounds of the Association, and earnestly recommend that they endeavor to give it an enlarged support.

S. D. Davis was appointed to write the Corresponding Letter for the present session, which he did, as follows:—

Corresponding Letter.

The Seventh-day Baptist Virginia Association, to her sister Associations and brethren:—

DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST,—Under the protecting guidance of Him who controls the destinies of this world, we have been permitted to hold another annual meeting, notwithstanding we find the time we have given ourselves in which to transact the business of this meeting to be far too short, yet we trust that we have adopted some measures which will prove a lasting blessing to us. We are happy to say, that all our matters have been conducted with unanimity and harmony of feeling, and, we hope, for the glory of God. General union and harmony prevails in our churches, and although religion does not flourish amongst us as we wish, yet we trust the Lord has not forsaken us, but will yet revive his work amongst us. Brethren, pray for us. We were much gratified to welcome to our body T. E. Babcock, as a delegate from the Western Association. We were much cheered with his presence and encouraged by his labors, which we hope will be as bread cast upon the waters. Dear brethren, we feel grateful for such favors, and hope they may be more frequently enjoyed by us.

The Secretaries were instructed to revise the minutes, forward them to the editors of the Sabbath Recorder, and request their publication.

P. Davis was appointed to preach the introductory discourse at the next session; J. S. Davis, alternate.

The Committee on the place of holding the next session recommended that it be held with the Church on the South Fork of Hughes' River, Ritchie County, Va. The Association adopted the recommendation, and adjourned to meet at that place on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in September, 1854, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

JEWISH MISSIONS.

Several months ago the Jews of this country received accounts of a melancholy state of things among their co-religionists in China. These accounts, connected as they were with intimations that Christians would probably take advantage of their circumstances to turn the poor Jews from the faith of their fathers, led some zealous American Jews to think it their duty "to hasten to the rescue of their Chinese brethren, whose spiritual welfare is threatened by such imminent danger." Accordingly it is "proposed to send to them a missionary, who is to revive the dying embers of their faith, and to teach the religion of their ancestors, the leading principles of which, in the course of centuries, and in the total state of isolation of these Jews for so many ages, have been corrupted, and the most sacred rites neglected or forgotten." This subject has been considerably discussed in the Jewish papers—one of which, The Occident, takes occasion to recommend Jewish missions in general. The following extract from an article by the editor of that paper, will no doubt interest our readers:—

And we tell our readers, that there are other quarters of the globe which require the presence of enlightened Israelites besides China, to diffuse the pure knowledge of the law, which is, alas! wanting in many portions of Asia and Africa, where long isolation or the tyrannical measures of the governments, have deprived the Jews of that mental elevation which ought to be theirs, in consonance with the heavenly law which they possess as their birthright. Nay, even in America, it will be necessary, sooner or later, to resort to a species of domestic missions, in order to instruct the scattered small bodies all over the country; to encourage them to persevere in their allegiance to their faith, and to take care that they do not lapse into infidelity, or become estranged from our religion. This is no imaginary danger of which we are speaking, but a sad reality, which has presented itself to our mind a thousand times with all its terrors. Our work goes to fully an hundred small places, where we have a single subscriber in each; it may be that each of these readers is the only Israelite in the place, or that there are one or two others near him. These now will understand us better than those who live surrounded by many Israelites, who have synagogues and officers of religion in their immediate vicinity. These solitary sojourners, as many of them are in a strange land, will tell those who inquire of them, that their religious profession is often made a matter of suspicion against them; that they are attacked, argued with, persuaded, to induce them to join some of the many sectarian churches, of which the land is filled to overflowing; while a synagogue is, perhaps, hundreds of miles distant. Take, for instance, the immense State of Texas; although many Jews live scattered here and there, there is but one incipient congregation, as far as known to us. Take, again, the State of Georgia; there are but two organized societies, although hardly a village exists without a few Jews. So, North Carolina, Alabama, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, Illinois, and, in fact, nearly every one of the southern and western States, into all of which Jews are constantly immigrating, and are often lost among the masses, because they are without religious instruction. It is this dreadful reflection which has haunted our thoughts, while we were traveling last year through the country; and we have asked ourself, and others, too, many times:—"Where is all this to end?" We have also spoken with a few intelligent men, and they agreed with us that some good might be done by the establishment of an itinerant ministry, whose business it should be to visit every accessible place, at least once a year, to exhort in private those who live alone, and to hold public meetings wherever a Minyan could be, by any possibility, brought together.

It is folly to assert that missions are unknown to Judaism; on the contrary, the first enterprise of the kind of which we have any knowledge is distinctly stated in the second

Book of Chronicles xvii. 7—9, that Jehoshaphat, the fourth king of Juhad, sent round his chiefs names there, together with a number of Levites and priests, bearing with them a copy of the laws of God, to teach the people of all the Jewish cities the contents of the books of Moses. Hezekiah sent messengers round to request the remnant of the kingdom of Israel (see 2 Chron. xxx. 10) to come to Jerusalem, to celebrate in concert the Feast of Unleavened Bread, "but," says the text, "they did laugh at and deride them;" though others were humbled and sought the capital of Judah to join with their brothers, who had not become quite as corrupt as the subjects of Samaria's rulers. Yes, in those days also there were scorners, men who esteemed the world higher than the will of God, who indulged their passions and slew their immortal spirit; infidelity is not a growth of the present age solely; and hence, in all times, those who came to teach a better course of life to others, had to retire with aching heart, and with mortified feelings at the blindness of the people, at the deafness of the chiefs, who were all quick and alive to their worldly advantages, but deaf, blind—ay, dead—to the everlasting welfare of their undying souls. Still it is evident that the pious and great spirits of the ages of Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah, did not deem it unworthy of themselves, nor beneath their dignity, to travel through the length and breadth of the land to instruct their brothers in their duties. That great success attended them is beyond question; for let us look at the frightful immoralities connected with idolatry, and the general forgetfulness of duty consequent thereon; and then compare with this the altered state which subsequently was witnessed, when such men as Assa and his son, Uzzizah and Jotham, Hezekiah and Josiah, came to the throne; and it must be evident that the exertion of the mighty minds, who never were wanting in Israel, were blessed instruments of a renewed religious life, at least for the time being. It must not be forgotten that in those days there were no mails hastening through the country with lightning speed to carry the flying leaves of knowledge to every hamlet, and to every cottage; nor was the mighty engine, which we call the Press, endowed with the power of steam, throwing off in one day thousands of sheets, each of which would have been the labor of months to a ready scribe. If, with all these appliances at our command, society progresses so slowly in any given direction, that a lifetime does not suffice to mark even one decided step in advance in the right direction; how powerful, how unceasing must have been the process of oral instruction which the teachers had to dispense in ancient Israel, in order to reach the houses and hearts of those who had become bewildered in the process of years of idolatry and political misrule, when priests complacently obeyed tyrant kings, and when the deceptive prophets taught what they were bidden from the royal council board, or what a favorite sultana dictated to her fawning minions.

Agricultural Jews.—An impression prevails extensively, that Agriculture is nowhere pursued by communities of Jews. That this impression is erroneous, has been repeatedly asserted by recent travelers in the East, and is established by the following extract from a letter written by Rev. J. Nicolayson, and published in the Report of the London Jewish Mission Society. Mr. Nicolayson, in company with Rev. J. C. Reichardt, visited some villages of agricultural Jews in Upper Galilee. On the arrival of the party at Bakeeah, the largest of the villages, they met some of the Druses, concerning whom they say:—

"Of these we made inquiries about the number and occupation of the Jews here, and were happy to find them genuine peasants. They conducted us to their very rural synagogue. Here we were at once surrounded by Jews of all ages, with whom we could freely converse in Hebrew and Arabic. . . . The information we gathered from them was peculiarly interesting, as showing not only that they are real agriculturists (or genuine peasants) and actual freehold proprietors of the fields they cultivate, but also that their ancestors have been such before and at the dispersion by the Romans, and continued such in those parts ever since, up to this present time. This their traditional belief is fully confirmed by their speaking no other language (besides the Hebrew) except the Arabic, as spoken in that part of the country, and by their Druse neighbors, as well as by their being still in possession of their ancestral vineyards and fields."

The Jews in Morocco.—The state of the Jews in the Empire of Morocco is said to be deplorable in the extreme. A letter from Mogador says, in relation to them:—

"There is not a creature here, amongst the 10,000 inhabitants, who can prescribe any remedy for the various diseases which may prevail from time to time. They are indeed left to sink under sickness, or to nature's cure alone. Cruel oppression and degradation is still the lot of the outcast Jew. He has to render the most abject submission to his Mahommedan rulers, and in every way to acknowledge their supremacy. The poor outcast Jew is obliged, when passing a mosque, or in entering the corn-market, to take off his shoes. He dares not ride in town, nor may he have any covering on the head, save a peculiar black cap, the significant mark of the son of slavery. He is compelled, when speaking to the meanest Moor, to address him as 'Yasside' (my lord.) After he pays his yearly tribute to the emperor, the question is put to him, by the soldier in waiting on the governor, with a blow on the back of the head, 'Say, art thou not the slave of the Sultan?' The answer must be, 'Yea, my lord, I am.'"

The Fair of the American Institute this year promises to be very attractive. Oct. 6, Castle Garden will be open for the admission of visitors, from 9 A. M. until 10 P. M., and continue the same each day (Sundays excepted) until the close. Oct. 10, testing of ploughs, near Frye's Hotel, Flatbush, on the plank road to Coney Island, at 11 o'clock A. M. Oct. 11, ploughing and spading matches, same place, 11 o'clock A. M. Oct. 17, special exhibition of roses and cut flowers, at 12 o'clock M. Oct. 19, 20, and 21, cattle show at Hamilton-square. Oct. 20, Anniversary Address, by the Hon. Wm. H. Seward, at Metropolitan Hall, at 7 P. M.

Burning Papers in Virginia.—The Religious Telescope, the organ of the "United Brethren in Christ," published at Circleville, in this State, has recently been submitted to the flames at Glenville, Va., by the Postmaster at that place, on account of its Anti-Slavery sentiments. A large number of the members of this Church resided in Virginia, and of course many of them wished to read their official organ. But their Postmaster steps in between them and this boon; and after having burned the Telescope pens the following cool epistle to its editor:—

Glenville, Va.

Mr. John Lawrence—Sir: I feel it my duty, as Deputy Postmaster, to inform you that your paper, called the Religious Telescope, is one of such character as cannot be distributed in the State of Virginia. Nothing of an abolition character can, under the laws of this State, be put in circulation. I was sorry to learn upon inspection of your paper, that it contained violent abolition articles, such as are in direct violation of the laws of this State, which subject the editors and circulators of all such documents to imprisonment in the State Penitentiary, for not less than one nor more than five years. It is made my duty, under the law, to inspect all such papers, and have the same burned. And your paper, being found upon examination to be one of the above character, was consigned, on last Saturday, to the flames, in the presence and by the direction of the Magistrate. A copy of your paper has been retained in this office, and will be before the Grand Jury of our County at the next Circuit Court.

Yours, &c., W. E. Herrendon, P. M.

Pastoral Vacancies.—There is matter for reflection in the following paragraph from one of our Baptist exchanges:—

"If there is a vacancy in the pastoral office in the providence of God, and beyond human control, how much better to pray the Lord of the harvest to send a man after his own heart, than to go into the market place to bid with money upon the pastors of other churches. We should be gratified to see many churches repenting and doing their first works by calling back their old pastors, who have received expulsion to open the way for a new and popular gift. Some have already done this of late, and we are looking for happy results. We hope many more will follow their example. Those pastorates among us, which are of the longest standing, are the most respected and the most useful. The pastors are happier, enjoy more of the confidence of the people, and have far more influence, in the surrounding community. Confidence is of slow growth, and is the result of long and intimate acquaintance. The people, too, are more stable, are saved from a world of trouble incident on frequent changes, and have much more of what the Hungarian Patriot calls solidarity."

Methodist Missions.—At a meeting of the Methodist Mission Board, held in New York on the 21st ult., several interesting items were reported. Mr. Wiley and family, with the five other mission families of Fuh-Chau, China, were all crowded into two houses on an island in the river Min, for fear of the revolutionary movements which threatened their safety. A missionary goes to Oregon on the 5th of October, and the Rev. M. Reasoner has been transferred from the Genesee to the California Conference, to go forward in the month of December. The state of the Treasury shows that there is like to be less of trouble in the financial department than in some former years. Alluding to legacies, the Board say: We continue to receive notice that the missionary cause is not forgotten by those who find they have something to leave which may be caused to "follow after" them to testify that their works were righteous. In regard to missionaries, they say, that signs indicate that prayer is heard, and "laborers" are like to be found both for home and foreign fields.

Mr. Oncken.—The injury to Rev. Mr. Oncken, by the casuality at Norwalk, Ct., proves to have been very serious, and has compelled him to give up a large number of engagements. In the Journal and Messenger for Sept. 23, we find a letter from Dr Bright, of which the following is an extract:—

"His physician says that he can not go westward to labor, as he is, without the hazard of his life. This is strong language, but I am afraid it is none too strong. The engagements in Michigan, Illinois, &c., coming after October 1, may be expected to be fulfilled, but in Ohio and Indiana he must depend on opportunities for speaking in November and early December. These repeated interruptions of Mr. Oncken's plans are almost discouraging, but they are sent, we are bound to believe, in wisdom and mercy, though we can not see them so now."

Jewish Gratitude.—The following illustration of Jewish gratitude is given in a late number of the Jewish Intelligencer, in connection with a biographical sketch of a Jewish missionary:—

"His most faithful attendant, during his long illness, was an unbaptized Jewess, whom he had formerly assisted when in great distress. Hearing of his illness, she left the Duchy of Posen, and hastened to his sick bed in Danzig. She never forsook him in all his subsequent sufferings; she accompanied him to Berlin, and subsequently to Sachsa in Norhausen, where his earthly career was brought to a close in the house of his brother. She then returned to her native place, and has since been unheard of. But surely, this generous act of this Hebrew woman is a striking record, amongst many others, of the strong feeling and susceptibility of the Jewish heart."

A Fearful Account.—Mr. Everett, late Secretary of State, is generally known as a gentleman of extensive information, and one who will "not speak without book" on important statistical facts. From a computation of his it appears that the use of alcoholic beverages cost the United States directly, in ten years, $120,000,000; has burnt or otherwise destroyed $5,000,000 worth of property; has destroyed 300,000 lives; sent 250,000 to prison and 100,000 children to the poor house; caused 1,500 murders and 5,000 suicides; and has bequeathed to the country 1,000,000 orphan children.

European News.

By the arrival of the steamer America at Halifax on the 29th Sept., European dates to Sept. 17 have been received. There is no news of importance by this arrival. We give a short summary.

Relative to the Eastern question, it was currently reported—although no foundation was apparent for the report—that Turkey had attacked the Russian outposts, but that no general engagement had taken place. The following are the words of a Vienna dispatch: "The Czar rejects the Turkish modifications, but abides by the Vienna Note, and promises to evacuate the Principalities if the Porte accepts it, pure and simple." This yet leaves one chance for peace. The Turkish levy of 80,000 additional troops went on actively, and detachments were constantly marching to join Omar Pasha on the Danube. As to the prospect of war, it is generally believed it will take place, but when, cannot be foretold.

The Asiatic cholera is spreading in England. Cases are reported at Liverpool and London, and over 100 had occurred at Newcastle, 50 of them proving fatal.

In France, public attention continued chiefly occupied with the price of food. The Moniteur publishes a decree reducing the duties on imported cattle and wheat. It was reported that tickets would be issued to the poor, entitling them to receive bread at a nominal rate.

In China, the revolutionary army retained its position. The Tartars had attempted to take Amoy, but without success.

One Day's Experience in Maine.—The morning I left Waterville a hotel keeper from a town in Maine stepped up to a lawyer from Bangor, who was standing near me, and took him aside, and with woeful face told him that he had just come from Boston with a bill of liquors to the amount of $400, directed to one of the town agents near his place of business; that the folks from Rockland had telegraphed to Waterville that the liquor should be delivered to no one but that said town agent; that he tried to get it, and could not. He asked the lawyer what he should do. The professional gentleman told him that he had better get the town agent to claim it for him. The rumseller said it would cost more to bribe the town agent than the liquor was worth. The lawyer told him there was no help for him, and he went on his way sorrowing. I that day passed through the beautiful country which lies between the rivers Kennebec and Penobscot. We dined at a village not more than seventeen miles from Bangor. I asked the landlord if he had anything to take, (as last year when I dined there he had.) He said, "No; it is no use to try to keep it. The last four gallons I had, I was two months selling, and they prosecuted me five times."

Gratifying Results.—The N. Y. Recorder says that at the stated meeting of the Board of Officers and Managers of the American Sunday-School Union, held at the Society's House, Sept. 20, 1853, among other interesting proceedings, reports were made of the doings of eighty-seven Missionaries, the aggregate of whose labors is shown in the following statement: Sales of Sunday-School Books, $9,141 23; Donations to Poor Schools, $1,690 01; Sunday-Schools Visited, 804; Sunday-Schools Organized, 539; Bibles and Testaments Distributed, 686. In accomplishing the good work which is thus reported, twelve hundred public addresses were made, and more than twenty-five thousand miles of travel accomplished. The friends and contributors of the Society must be gratified at these tokens of its efficiency and prosperity.

Shadows of Ministerial Life.—A minister in Indiana—Presbyterian, we presume—writes thus to the Central Christian Herald:

"We live on less than $200 per annum, including horse keeping and traveling expenses—and my traveling in a year is not less than three thousand miles. I have to go to a neighboring wood, and fell down the trees, chop them into ten or twelve feet logs, hitch my horse to them, drag them to the house, chop, saw and split them for stove fuel, and then, after preaching two sermons a week, riding most weeks fifty or sixty miles, teaching Sabbath-School, riding three miles to post office and store, etc.—even then I am accused by my brethren, 'of doing nothing but riding about and reading my books,' and told that I 'might work a little and earn a part of my living!'"

The Public School Children of New York are being treated to a sight of the Crystal Palace. Arrangements have been made which will enable all to visit it. Sept. 27th, the Sixteenth Ward School No. 30, in Twenty-fourth-st., visited the Exhibition 2,219 strong. There were in the boys' department, 600 pupils; in the girls' department, 610, and in the primary department, 1,009 girls and boys. The whole school presented a very creditable appearance, and maintained order throughout the visit, which was prolonged to two hours and a half. The number of teachers connected with No. 30 is 33.

At a Political Meeting held in the Park, New York, on the evening of Sept. 26th, the platform erected for the speakers gave way, and about a dozen persons were injured, some of them quite seriously. Mike Walsh was among the number, and received internal injuries from which fatal consequences are apprehended.

A felony was recently committed at the County Penitentiary, at Flatbush, one of the very last places one would suppose that a person would venture into for the purpose of committing a theft. The entrance was gained through one of the second story windows (which has heretofore generally been kept open) by means of a ladder, which had been raised to the top of the fence in the rear of the building. The thief then drew the ladder up and laid one end upon the window sill, some ten feet distant, by means of which he gained an easy entrance into the drying apartment, where the prisoners' clothes are kept. He gathered up a large number and retreated without being detected. The articles stolen are valued at about $60.

Is the Maine Law Constitutional?—The reader will find (says the Maine Law Advocate) the opinions of all the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States on the several points of this law, in the fifth volume of Howard's Reports of the decisions in United States Courts, page 504:

Chief Justice Taney said:

"If any State deems the retail and internal traffic in ardent spirits injurious to its citizens, and calculated to produce idleness, vice and debauchery, I see nothing in the Constitution of the United States to prevent it from regulating and restraining the traffic, or from prohibiting it altogether, if it thinks proper. Every State, therefore, may regulate its own internal traffic according to its own judgment, and upon its own views of the interest and well-being of its citizens.'—(5 Howard, 573.)

Mr. Justice McLean said:

"If the foreign article be injurious to the health or morals of the community, a State may, in the exercise of that great and comprehensive police power which lies at the foundation of its prosperity, prohibit the sale of it."—(5 Howard, 592.)

And in regard to the destruction of property, he said:

"The acknowledged police power of a State extends often to the destruction of property. A nuisance may be abated. Every thing prejudicial to the health or morals of a city may be removed. Merchandise from a port where a contagious disease prevails, being liable to communicate disease, may be excluded; and in extreme cases it may be thrown into the sea."

Mr. Justice Catron said:

"I admit, as inevitable, that if the State has the power of restraint by licenses to any extent, it has the discretionary power to judge of its limit, and may go the length of prohibiting it altogether, if such be its policy."

The Crystal Palace.—The charge for admission to the Crystal Palace is henceforth reduced to twenty-five cents as follows:—

1. For associations or companies of Working Men, applying in considerable numbers for admission together;
2. For all persons arriving by Excursion Trains arranged expressly for visiting the Fair; and
3. For all persons, without exception, on each Saturday.

To others than those included above, the charge will be fifty cents each admission, as heretofore, and there will be no weekly tickets.

SUMMARY.

The Waterville Mail says that several persons have just returned from the gold diggings at Madrid, on Sandy River, Me. The company engaged in digging consists of six persons, most of them from Springfield, Mass. They have bought twenty or thirty acres of land, and are engaged in sinking a shaft and washing the earth for gold. The amount obtained thus far will pay them moderate wages, nothing more. The gold is found in fine black sand, in pieces ranging from about the size of a wheat kernel to the smallest perceptible particles—though pieces are said to have been found as large as a kernel of corn. The opinion is expressed that the quantity is small and that the mines will not pay for working.

The Rev. Gustavus Hines and his brother, the Rev. H. K. Hines, who took the overland route for Oregon, as Missionaries, write from Fort Laramie, June 23: "We are now by the good providence of God, safe at this point, and prosperously continuing our journey to our future field of labor. By the continuation of heavenly mercy we shall be among the first arrivals in Oregon, and shall rejoice to be again engaged in the active labor of a Methodist minister. Health on the Plains is good."

In New Barne, N. C., recently, during a severe thunder shower, a large turkey buzzard was soaring at a great hight. A vivid flash of lightning was seen and the bird came tumbling from aloft, but literally torn to pieces. The fruit starts out without any appearance of blossoms, and does not ripen until the second season. Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

Little Topsy's Song.

"Topsy neber was born
Neber had a moder;
'Specs I growed a nigger brat,
Jist like any oder.
Whip me till the blood pours down—
Ole missus used to do it;
She said she'd cut my heart right out,
But neber could get to it.
Got no heart, I don't belieb—
Niggers do widout em.
Neber heard of God or Love,
So can't tell much about em."

This is Topsy's savage song,
Topsy 'cute and clever;
Hurrah, then, for the white man's right—
Slavery forever!

"I 'spects I's very wicked,
That 's jist what I am;
Ony you jist give me chance,
Won't I rouse Ole Sam?
'T aint no use in being good.
Cos I'se black, you see;
I neber cared for nothin' yet,
And nothin' cares for me.
Ha! ha! ha! Miss Feely's hand
Dun know how to grip me;
Neber like to do no work,
And wont, widout they whip me."

This is Topsy's savage song—
Topsy 'cute and clever;
Hurrah, then, for the white man's right—
Slavery forever!

"Don't you die, Miss Evy,
Else I go dead too;
I knows I'se wicked, but I'll try
And be all good to you.
You hab taught me better things,
Though I'se nigger skin;
You hab found poor Topsy's heart,
Spite of all its sin.
Don't you die, Miss Evy dear,
Else I go dead too;
Though I'se black, I'se sure that God
Will let me go wid you."

This is Topsy's human song,
Under Love's endeavor;
Hurrah, then, for the white child's work—
Humanity forever! [Eliza Cook.

The Vender in Trouble.

This chapter we take from the Cleveland Herald. How many there are who, like this poor man, wish the Maine Law would remove the temptation which they cannot withstand.

A young man, in a state of intoxication, stepped into a confectionery establishment on Water street, a few evenings since, and called for a glass of beer. Noticing his condition, the proprietor refused to sell him any, remarking, that he had already more than was proper for him.

"Oh," answered the young man, "I've been trying to keep sober all day, and I can't."

"Well, I can't sell you any beer, and you need not ask for it again."

"Only one glass; come, here's the money."

"Not one."

"I'm so thirsty—so dry."

"Well, there's a glass of water; drink."

Stumbling up to the counter, the poor inebriate drank a couple of glasses of water; and then, turning around, said, "You are the only man that has refused me liquor to-day—I wish they all had."

"He put his hand into his breast pocket, and took tremblingly out a small miniature, opened it, and gazed upon it for some moments. It was the daguerreotype of an elderly lady, upon whose face were strongly marked lines of care and sorrow; pale, almost marble, the countenance, and the eyes almost seemed to search his soul, and speak reproof to her erring son.

"Oh, my mother," he said, "how much trouble, sorrow, and unhappiness I have caused thee!" His emotion was very great. At last, tears came to his relief; he wept like a child; while upon the countenances of those around was depicted symyathy and commiseration. At length he said, "I'm childish, foolish, weak!" He compressed his quivering lips, closed the miniature, put it in his pocket, and turning, tottered out, saying, "You won't give me a glass of beer—a glass to drown all!" He paused.

"No!" was the answer. He was gone.

"Had I many such customers," observed the proprietor, to those around him, "I would take my beer pump and pitch it into the middle of the street. I wish the Maine Liquor Law would be submitted to us; I, yes, I, who derive a large profit from the sale of my beer, would VOTE FOR IT, and that, too, freely, willingly, happily."

"I came," remarked a bystander, "to get a glass of beer, but this fellow has so sickened my taste that more bitter than gall would be the stimulant should I drink it. Henceforth, since habit grows upon us unawares, and since habit is second nature, I will desist from taking even my occasional glass."

A Mammoth Hotel.

The Metropolitan Hotel, New York, was opened Sept. 1, 1853. The following statement will give some idea of its extent and the cost of keeping it up:—

More than two years were occupied in the construction of that immence edifice. It was finished and furnished throughout with magnificence. From the first hour of its opening the house has literally been crowded with guests. The arrivals and departures have averaged more than one thousand per week; and such has been the desire to secure even a temporary habitation at the Metropolitan, that frequently more than one hundred cots have been spread for weeks in succession. The public parlors, reception rooms, reading rooms, bath rooms, and in fact, every available spot, has been in requisition for sleeping places. To make room for the rush of travelers, the proprietors have leased two large houses in their immediate vicinity, for the accommodation of their employees, and they have also been compelled to provide lodgings in neighboring houses for many of their regular boarders.

The Metropolitan Hotel proper will accommodate six hundred, and it has had from the start more than that number within its walls. Three hundred persons are employed in different capacities about the establishment, averaging one employed to every two visitors. The wages of employees range from two shillings to five dollars per day. Four thousand pieces are washed daily and in an emergency, fifteen minutes suffice to wash, dry, iron, and deliver linen for occupants of the house.

There is one continual round of feasting from morning till night, or rather from morning till morning again. The first breakfast table is spread at five o'clock in the morning, and until one o'clock the next morning the different meals are served; at every hour of the day and night the travelers arriving or departing can supply the inner man with every luxury the market affords. The frequent arrival and departure of trains and steamers makes this indispensable. Among the leading articles of consumption in one year were, beef, 418,000 pounds; lamb and mutton, 3,500 head; veal, 150 head; fish and lobster, 110,000 lbs.; oysters and clams, 626,000; poultry and game, 171,000 head; ham and pork, 91,000 lbs.; butter and cheese, 65,000; eggs, 780,000; milk and cream, 204,000 quarts; flour and corn meal, 2,800 bbls.; fruits and vegetables, value, $20,000; brandy and other liquors, 6,322 gallons; champaigne, 21,160 bottles; sherry, madeira, &c., 22,948 bottles; claret and white wines, 13,942 bottles. This is independent of malt liquors, cordials, cooking wines, &c. The beef consumed last year in this house required a drove of one thousand head to supply.

The gross cash receipts of the Metropolitan Hotel, for the year ending September 1, 1853, were $500,000, of which about twenty per cent. were profits. The cost of heating the house and the gas consumed during the year, was $14,000. Croton water rent, $4,000. Six stages and twenty carriages are constantly employed in transporting passengers to and from the Hotel.

From the N. Y. Tribune of Tuesday, Sept. 27.

There is a Man Killed!

It is a common expression in this city—so common that it hardly excites a passing notice. But when death in his most terrific form comes staring us in the face, we start back. We did so this (Monday) afternoon, about 5 o'clock. We were walking down Broadway, a little below Fulton-st., thinking of life and the busy throng of men and women of which we counted one, when a slight rustling noise just over our head caused us to cast an eye up, to see whether a stone or hod-full of brick might be coming down from the new building we were passing. There was something coming—but not brick or stone. It was a dark object, quite undistinguishable, whether animate or not. Our doubts were soon solved; it struck the pavement just by our feet, rebounded and fell again. It was a man!—it is a lifeless mass of bruised flesh. One minute before, he was at his work on the topmost stone of a five-story wall, (he was a stone-setter by trade,) full of the fond anticipations of 6 o'clock, and then away to his home, his wife and children, and next week he would be on his way to his own native highlands of Scotland, to bless the eyes of an aged father with the sight of a long absent son, and with tales of his prosperity in the country of his adoption. For this, he had but a few hours previous paid his passage, and, in thought, was already crossing the ocean—was already in the enjoyment, in his day-dream, of the time when he should form one of the circle at Ingleside, and of the pleased faces that would greet him there. Perhaps, from his elevated perch, he was already stretching his neck away eastward, when some disarrangement of the hoisting apparatus gave him an unlucky blow, and down he came from his dizzy hight to the pavement below. What screams of terror were sent up from several female throats, as they saw the poor man falling dead at their feet—almost upon their heads.

Who is he? What is his name? Where does he live? were the rapid questions put, but not answered.

One thought his name was Hugh, another Lewis. Somebody said his surname was Nolan. His employer only knew that his name was Lewis, that he was a good workman, and he believed he lived in Thirtieth-st. No one could tell where. So the bruised and bloody corpse was taken away to the Station House by the police, and thence to the "Dead House"—the place of the unrecognized dead, to wait for his friends to come and claim him. Oh! how that poor wife will wait and wait for that husband this night! We can almost fancy that we see the tea-pot as it sits steaming upon the little furnace in the chimney-corner. We almost hear her say, "Oh, dear! the supper will be quite cold before Hughie gets here." Yes, poor woman, it will be quite cold before your husband gets here. Give those little ones their supper. Don't put them off any longer with "Wait a bit, till father comes." Give them their supper, eat thine own in sorrow, go to bed; perchance to sleep, and dream, and start up in a fright at the unwonted absence of thy ever-at-home, toiling husband, "Has he come?" says the little trundle-bed occupant. "No, my child, he has not come." No, he has not come! He never will come again! Oh, what a night of sorrow in that poor man's house. How the morning will open to them without hope. Now comes a rumor of "A man killed." Now she roams wildly about to inquire who? what? where? At length the morning paper arrives, and there is an item headed, "A Man Killed!" a mason—fell from a Broadway building—name unknown—carried away by the police; and that carries her away to the nearest Police Station. They know nothing, but the kind heart of the Captain is touched, and he says, "I will inquire." How? And he sits down by a table in one corner, by a little machine—it is the telegraph—and in five minutes he answers, "The body was taken to the Dead House." Then away she goes, and there—there will be a recognition—what a recognition! Let us draw the curtain.

Cultivation of the Cranberry.

Most of the attempts at cultivating the cranberry have been decided failures; but a very few quite successful experiments have served to keep up a succession of efforts, with the hope of final and uniform success. Usually the most sanguine have had to hope against hope. A very enterprising cultivator has just informed us that although his plants grow well, and begin to bear, on the low ground on which he has planted them, and where they succeed much better than on upland, yet the growth of the grass so greatly overtops them, that he is nearly ready to give up the struggle, having spent about forty dollars already the present season in fruitlessly endeavoring to weed them.

A letter lately received from a close and experienced cultivator, contains the following remarks on this subject: "Much has been said about raising cranberries on upland; but I think the main point has not been understood. Such land as ours (strong fertile soil of Western New York) would not produce cranberries; but I have seen such among the Pennsylvania mountains, (called the Beech Woods,) which would doubtless prove congenial to that plant. It requires a cold, sour soil, such as would agree with the black spruce, and disagree with Indian corn. There are also great tracts in the primitive region north of the Mohawk, which I should judge would be very favorable—wet sour land, where corn would refuse to grow, or to any advantage. Could not such farmers, depending on oats or barley, and potatoes and cranbarries, do as well as many who cultivate wheat?" [Country Gentleman.

Brave Girls.

The Cincinnatti Gazette chronicles the arrival of two Irish girls in that city who walked most of the distance from New York to Cincinnati. The Gazette says:—

They arrived in New York City, from their mother country, about five weeks ago. They came alone, the remainder of the family having arrived and settled near this city about a year since. When they left the ship which brought them over, they had left about seven dollars in money. Not having enough to transport them to this city, they resolved on walking as far as they could. The first three days they walked about forty miles a day. The fourth day they rode on a freight train about thirty miles, and walked fifteen more. Thus they continued day after day, stopping at country houses for their food, and to rest over night. They kept the railway track from New York City up to Albany, thence to Buffalo. At Buffalo they rested two days, and then started again. They walked to Dunkirk, thence to Erie and Cleveland; and so anxious were they to meet their friends that they passed through Cleveland for this city. When at Spring Valley, on the Little Miami Railway, on Sunday morning, they requested of Conductor Fuller permission to ride to this city, briefly stating their case, and recent tramp. Satisfied that they told the truth, he generously took them on board and brought them to Cincinnati. Their names were Hannah and Mary Donahue.

Killing Noxious Weeds.

This subject is one worth inquiring about, end one on which a comparison of facts and experience would be valuable.

It is a well known truism that the leaf is the lung or breathing organ of vegetable life. The tenacity with which roots retain vitality varies in an extraordinary degree, and is possessed almost exclusively by perennial plants. The Canada Thistle is one of the most tenacious of life of all the pests of the field—and yet they may be eradicated by one season's constant cutting down with the hoe, especially if a hot and dry one. We have known them to be entirely annihilated by once mowing, about harvest time, and have known it to fail a hundred times after. What its success depended upon—whether the period of its age, the weather, or other peculiarity—could not be ascertained. Milk weed (asclepias syriaca,) nettles, thorough-wort (cupatorium perfoliatum,) and other perennials that infest new and low meadows, yield to the scythe after two years mowing. Johnswort, we believe to be an exception, and a hard customer.

The narrow leafed dock is nearly biennial, and often dies if allowed to fully ripen its seeds, but if cut before, always sprouts and multiplies its suckers. The broad-leaf dock is much more tenacious of vitality, and never does die—like quack grass—short of being dried and put through a coffee-mill.

[Rural New Yorker.

The Queen of Philadelphia.—The richest woman in Philadelphia is Mrs. Rush, the wife of Dr. James Rush, of that city. Dr. Rush is a man of eminent talents and acquirements, but the enormous wealth of his wife overshadows him. We hear little of the husband, but of the movements of his lady, who has an income of one hundred thousand dollars per annum in her own right, the world is not permitted to remain in ignorance. Her arrivals and departures are epochs in the history of the watering-places she condescends to visit. She dwells in a palace, the reception-rooms of which will accommodate one thousand guests without being crowded. Her drawing-rooms are said to be unsurpassed, even in Europe, in the richness of their furniture and decorations. Extensive conservatories, with rare exotics, are attached to the main building, and no luxury which money can procure has been omitted in Mrs. Rush's almost regal establishment. She is said to be liberal, charitable, and amiable, although somewhat fond of making herself conspicuous in the world of fashion. It is not exactly the thing to hazard an opinion of a lady's age; but if it were, we should say that Mrs. Rush cannot be much on the sunny side of fifty, although she dresses down to thirty or five-and-thirty. Mrs. R. inherits nearly one-third of the property of her father, the late Jacob Ridgway, we believe. Her share, if we mistake not, amounted to between one and two millions of dollars.

Scarcity of Silver—Mr. D'Israeli, of the English Parliament, has been investigating the causes of the scarcity of silver, and gives the following as the principal causes of this scarcity:—

First, while the annual production of gold has quadrupled, the yield of the silver mines has remained stationary; and as the influx of gold has given an immense expansion to business of all kinds, and increased the demand for every commodity, silver being no more plentiful now than formerly, has become proportionably scarce. Secondly, in Holland, and some other European States, silver is the standard of value; and hence the excess of exportation to those countries over the importation from them, has to be paid for in silver coin. Thirdly, and chiefly, in India gold coin is not known among the natives, from whom the commodities of commerce are purchased, nor is gold in that country a legal tender; and as the excess of Indian exportation over importation is exceedingly great, there is an enormous drain of silver from Europe.

A Gallant Robber.—The Dixon (Mo.) Telegraph gives an account of a gallant knave who, a week or two ago, at Prophetstown, in Lee County, broke into a room in which two ladies and a child were sleeping in one bed. After collecting what valuables he could find, consisting principally of their watches and jewelry, he got ready to leave; but before doing so, leaned over and imprinted a warm kiss on the lady sleeping at the back of the bed. This roused the lady, and resulted in the capture of the thief. He was confined in the jail of Dixon, until one night last week, when he crept through the stove-pipe hole leading from his cell to an upper room, made a leap of some twenty feet, and "vamosed the ranch."

Important Improvement in Steel Pens.—Messrs. Myers and Co., the steel pen manufacturers of Birmingham, have just taken out patents for several novelties in this branch of trade, which are very likely to give their names a yet more extended reputation. The samples involve principles which have not before been applied to this branch of manufacture, and show an elaborate knowledge of the requirements of penmanship. In some, double action secures the requisite elasticity, while in others a most ingenious contrivance causes the pen to work upon an axis formed by a peculiar twist of the metal. Yet all is simple, and an absence of complicity renders the pen a most acceptable instrument where long application is necessary. There are, moreover, others termed skeleton pens, which fit on to a cut quill, and those of the old school wedded to the feathered tribe will find this a most agreeable and enduring nib. There are holders, too, included in this patent, which have various recommendations, and amongst them that of regulating the hardness or softness of the pen confided to them.

Bequest to a Medical College.—Leissing, a leading German actor, died recently. By his will, he leaves all his fortune, which was considerable, to the charitable institutions of Frankfort. In that document he states that he has been tormented all his life with the idea of being buried alive; and, in order to avoid any risk of such a contingency, he ordered that, as soon as his death should be declared by the competent medical authority, his skin should be flayed from his body from head to foot, and that the skin so taken off should be given to the Museum of Natural History of Frankfort. In his will, M. Leissing named the surgeon who should perform the operation, and left a large sum for his compensation. The Museum was applied to, to know whether it would accept so strange a bequest; it replied affirmatively, on condition that the skin should first undergo the treatment necessary for its preservation. The tribunal of Premièr Instance then sanctioned the will. [Medical Times.

Facts from the Census.—The greatest misfortunes fall more frequently, it appears, upon men than upon women. Of deaf and dumb persons in the United States, there are now ten thousand one hundred and three, of whom 5,231 are white males; 4,238 white females; 354 colored males, and 280 colored females. The aggregate of blind persons is 9,702, of whom 4,519 are white males, and 3,478 white females. The aggregate of insane persons is 15,768, of whom 7,669 are white males, and 7,459 white females. Of idiotic persons the aggregate is 15,706, of whom 8,276 are white males, and 5,954 white females. The total aggregate of persons suffering under the afflictions enumerated, is 51,279. It appears from this statement, that in each of the five unfortunate classes, the men outnumber the women. Of insane persons, the numbers are nearly equal, but idiocy is the lot of two thousand three hundred and twenty-two more men than women.

Onions for Fowls.—Scarcely too much can be said in praise of onions for fowls. They seem to be a preventive and remedy for various diseases to which domestic poultry is liable. Having frequently tested their excellencies, we can speak understandingly. For gapes and inflammation of the throat, eyes, and head, onions are almost a specific. We would recommend feeding fowls, and especially the young chicks, as many as they will eat as often as twice or three times a week. They should be finely chopped. A small addition of corn meal is an improvement. [Farming Mirror.

VARIETY.

General Magnan, Commander-in-Chief of Paris, has published the following general order, dated the 12th:—"On Sunday, the 9th instant, a soldier of the light infantry regiment, in crossing the Hlace de la Concorde, picked up four bank notes which a gentleman let fall, ran after the owner with them, and gave them to him. Not only would he not accept any recompense, but he obstinately refused to tell his name, saying that he did not wish to be known. The General-in-Chief has nothing to add to the recital of this action, in which probity and disinterestedness are allied to the rarest delicacy and modesty. He employs an order, as the only means at his disposal, of causing to reach the soldier the testimony of his liveliest satisfaction, for conduct which honors the whole army, in the person of one of its children."

The English judges are liberally paid. The Lord Chancellor receives fifty thousand dollars a year, with a retiring pension of sixteen thousand! The salary of the chief justice is forty thousand; the chief judge of common pleas, thirty-five thousand; and the justices twenty-five thousand each. These salaries sound extravagantly high to an American ear. In London, however, the scale of expenditure among the higher classes is such, that an income of fifty thousand dollars hardly makes more show than ten thousand here. Besides, it was found that, unless the salaries of judges were liberal, the best lawyers preferred a lucrative practice to the honors of the bench; and no one will deny, that only the best lawyers should be judges.

In 1840, Catlin, the painter, exhibited a number of Indians in London, among whom was Cadotte, an interpreter. Sarah Haynes, then a beautiful English girl, of sixteen, became enamored of Cadotte, and they were married. On reaching America, the romance of love was over; for three years they resided on the bank of the River St. Clair, on the little property the bride was possessed of; and since that at the Saut, where she taught French and music, to the time of her decease. She retained her beauty to the last, although exposed to many hardships by living in a birch-bark lodge with an Indian husband. She died in her twenty-eighth year, fortunately leaving no children to mourn the sad effects of an infatuated matrimonial match.

An old picture, recently sold at a sale at Bordeaux for a mere trifle (21s.) turns out to be by Othon Vanveen (Venius,) the master of Rubens, and has since been sold for £1,000. The subject is "Abigail going to meet David."

Edward Owens, lately a bridge-tender at Rancocas, N. J., has been examined on the charge of obstructing the railroad, thereby causing the accident by which Mr. Iredell was killed, and committed to jail for trial.

The receipts of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad, up to and including the 16th Sept., were $17,380 98, which would give for the month over $32,000.

This Seminary is confidently commended to the public as a first-class Institution, supplied in an eminent degree with all the facilities of education usually found in the Colleges and Universities of this country. It is provided with ten departments of Instruction, having an able and experienced Instructor at the head of each, thus giving such a division of labor as can alone secure the highest ability in conducting each department. Students can here complete an entire course of collegiate education, or be prepared for usefulness in mechanical, agricultural, or commercial pursuits, or for entering immediately upon professional studies. The Teachers' Department supplies the public with at least one hundred and fifty experienced teachers of common schools annually, and the Department of Elementary and Agricultural Chemistry affords the young farmer all the facilities desirable in the best agricultural schools. Having recently completed another spacious and elegant edifice for a chapel and recitation rooms, and being now engaged in extensive enlargements and alteration fot the accommodation of a much larger number of students than hitherto, the Trustees express their intention that the high character which this Institution has acquired, for thorough instruction, for strict moral and social training, and the best of educational advantages at a very moderate expense, shall be fully sustained. The location, on the N. Y. and Erie Railroad, two miles from the Alfred depot, is romantic, retired, and one of the healthiest in the world. Circulars, &c., gratuitous on application to Prof. W. C. Kenyon, or to Rev. N. V. Hull, Pres. of Trustees, Alfred Center Allegany Co., N. Y.

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millenial Times.

The connection to which we have called attention, also suggests the observation, that as prayer and sacrifice, and new moons and Sabbaths, are all specified together, as equally perverted by the Israelites and rejected by God, if any should still suppose that therefore the Sabbath and sacrifice are inseparably connected, we have again to remind such, that prayer and the Sabbath, being placed in the same relation, would, even on the same ground, be to be regarded as equally permanent. But the profanation complained of had respect not merely to what was peculiar to Israel as a people, but extended to duties incumbent on all, and to privileges which are common. Even the sins denounced were not peculiar to Israel. They are even now common among professing Christians. The message, by the prophet, was indeed addressed to Israel, whose sin of hypocrisy at the time was great, and grievously aggravated by their privileges and professions. Access to the throne of grace was and is, however, promised to all feeling a sense of need; and true prayer, wheresoever offered, is heard by the living and true God. It is not more so now than it was when He, in the language of the prophet, rejected the formality and semblance of prayer. So are we thus reminded, that as the Sabbath was made for man, and sanctified and blessed from the beginning, the sin of Israel in its profanation, either partially or entirely, did not interfere with the privilege of others willing and rejoicing "to keep it holy unto the Lord." Transgression of God's law is that which is to be feared and avoided; for if Israel's God "has caused the solemn feasts and Sabbaths to be forgotten in Zion," it is on account of sin that He "has despised in the indignation of His anger, the king and the priest." Lam. ii. 7.

In the prophecies of Hosea we have also a view presented of the loss of blessings, spiritual as well as temporal, the expression of God's displeasure on account of sin—their being deprived of the Sabbaths and Feasts being so classed with the desolation of the land. Jehovah exclaims, through the prophet, "Now will I discover her lewdness in the sight of her lovers, and none shall deliver her out of mine hand. I will also cause all her mirth to cease, her Feast-days, her new moons AND HER SABBATHS, and all her solemn feasts. And I will destroy her vines and her fig-trees, whereof she has said, These are my rewards that my lovers have given me; and I will make them a forest, and the beasts of the field shall eat them." Hos. ii, 10—12. Here, again, then, it is the "lewdness" of Israel, who has forgotten whence her blessings come, that is the cause of their loss. As "she did not know" to whom she was indebted for "her corn and wine, and oil," so neither did she know God's great grace in His gift of "her Feast-days, her new-moons, and her Sabbaths;" and therefore is she deprived of all these privileges, in order that she may be taught their true value when rightly used, and her source of supply. (Ver. 8.) But so far from that being other than an evil state, which thus deprived the people of God of their Sabbaths, the very terms in which it is announced imply its being a sore judgment; while, instead of the privation being designed to be perpetual, deliverance from it is immediately predicted—a prediction, however, the terms of which plainly point to the era of Millennial holiness and happiness as that of the rectification of the evils delineated. "Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her. And I will give her her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope; and she shall sing there as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt." Ver. 14, 15. If, indeed, the Feast-days and Sabbaths are made to cease on account of sin, it was to be inferred that the removal of that sin would be accompanied by the restoration of these privileges; but we are not left to inference, the fact itself being distinctly foretold.

It is also to be remarked, that while the prophets denounce the hypocrisy of a seeming homage to God, which is not real, and while they testify his rejection of such hollow services, these very prophets urge continually upon Israel their return to "the ancient paths," when they have strayed from them. Thus God, while charging upon Jerusalem shameless departure from Him, exhorts them, "Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." "They have caused them to stumble in their ways from the ancient paths, to walk in paths, in a way not cast up; to make their land desolate, and a perpetual hissing." Jer. vi. 16; xviii. 15. "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed. Even from the days of your fathers ye are gone away from mine ordinances, and have not kept them. Return unto me, and I will return unto you, saith the Lord of hosts." Mal. iii. 7.

This call for Israel to return to the observance of God's ordinances shall yet be obeyed; for His own promise is, "I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you, and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them an heart of flesh, that they may walk in my statutes, and keep mine ordinances, and do them; and they shall be my people, and I will be their God." Ezek. xi. 19, 20. Accordingly, the promise of God, repeated again and again, to the daughter of Zion in prophesy is, that when He shall have taken away her judgments, and cast out her enemy, He shall not only rejoice over her with joy, but more specifically does He declare, "I will gather them that are sorrowful for the solemn assembly, who are in thee, to whom the reproach of it was a burden." Zeph. iii. 18. And their services commemorative of past sorrows and desolations, fasts not instituted even by Moses, but appointed by the rulers of the people on account of national calamities, shall be changed into feasts of joy. In reference, as it appears, to an inquiry previously addressed to the priests and prophets of the Lord, "Shall I weep in the fifth month, separating myself, as I have done these so many years?" to which, at the time, an answer of rebuke was given; the prophet was instructed afterwards to say, "The fast of the fourth month and the fast of the fifth, and the fast of the seventh, and the fast of the tenth, shall be to the house of Judah joy and gladness, and cheerful feasts; therefore love the truth and peace." Zech. vii. 3, 5; viii. 19. And God has promised, concerning Jerusalem, that He will yet "bring it health and cure;" and, concerning His people, that He "will cure them, and will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth. And I will cause the captivity of Judah and the captivity of Israel to return, and will build them as at the first." They shall then be to Him "a name of joy, a praise and an honor before all the nations of the earth, which shall hear all the good that I do unto them." And in those days, when Judah shall be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely, God is pledged that "neither shall the priests the Levites want a man before me to offer burnt-offerings, and to kindle meat-offerings, and to do sacrifice continually. And the word of the Lord came unto Jeremiah, saying, Thus saith the Lord, If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not not be day and night in their season; then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; and with the Levites the priests my ministers. As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured; so will I multiply the seed of David my servant, and the Levites that minister unto me." Jer. xxxiii. 6—22.

We have already seen, that God's covenant with His people is "an everlasting covenant;" and we thus learn that His covenant with the Levites, also, has a guaranteed continuance coeval with that of the day and the night. The establishment of this covenant is very remarkably illustrated in the minute and circumstantial prediction which occupies the last eight chapters of the book of Ezekiel. In its future division of the land among the twelve tribes of Israel, when brought back from their present dispersion and captivity—a division essentially different from that made by Joshua of old—there is a large reservation, termed the Holy Oblation, in which the Temple is to be reërected. Ezek. xlviii. 8—22. This Holy Oblation is divided into three portions; and one of these is allotted to the Levites generally; (ver. 13;) while another portion is more specially "for the priests that are sanctified of the sons of Zadok, which have kept my charge, which went not astray when the children of Israel went astray, as the Levites went astray." (Ver. 11.) Reference is again made to this distinction between those of the Levites who had been faithful and those of them who had been unfaithful. The latter shall not then be permitted to enter the most holy place, nor to minister in the most solemn services, while yet they shall be "keepers of the charge" of God's sanctuary. "But the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok, that kept the charge of my sanctuary when the children of Israel went astray from me, they shall come near to me to minister unto me, and they shall stand before me to offer unto me the fat and the blood, saith the Lord God. They shall enter into my sanctuary, and they shall come near to my table, to minister unto me, and they shall keep my charge." Ezek. xliv. 9—16. To these Levites, of the seed of Zadok, are committed the ordinances pertaining to the purging and purifying of the altar. (Ezek. xliii. 18, 19.) Chambers are appointed for their dwelling in the sanctuary itself, (xl. 46;) and their duties and privileges are particularly enumerated, (xliv. 17—31.)

The same prediction expressly enjoins upon the house of Israel the building of the Temple, that they may observe its prescribed ordinances: "Son of man, show the House to the house of Israel, that they may be ashamed of their iniquities; and let them measure the pattern. And if they be ashamed of all that they have done, show them the form of the House, and the fashion thereof, and the goings-out thereof, and the comings-in thereof, and all the forms thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and all the forms thereof, and all the laws thereof; and write it in their sight, that they may keep the whole form thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and do them." (xliii. 10, 11.) It had previously been said unto the prophet, "Son of man, behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and set thine heart upon all that I shall show thee; for to the intent that I might show them unto thee art thou brought hither; declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel." (xl. 4.) Again, "And the Lord said unto me, Son of man, mark well, and behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, all that I say unto thee concerning all the ordinances of the House of the Lord, and all the laws thereof; and mark well the entering in of the House, with every going forth of the sanctuary." (xliv. 5.) The defined position of this sanctuary in a determined portion of the land to be divided among the several tribes of Israel, proves that this must be a material Temple. And the details of the different parts of the erection are given.

The ordinances of the altar themselves are minutely referred to. The "daily" sacrifice is restored, "by a perpetual ordinance, unto the Lord," (xlvi. 13, 14;) and yet again, "the people of the land shall come before the Lord in the solemn Feasts," (xlvi. 9, 11.) These solemn Feasts, as we have before seen, were appointed also to be ordinances "for ever;" and here, in accordance with the law of Moses, it is enjoined, "In the first month, in the fourteenth day of the month, ye shall have the Passover, a feast of seven days; unleavened bread shall be eaten." (xlv. 21.) The Feast on the Solemn Feasts of the Lord our God, Solomon at a later period declared, "This is an ordinance for ever to Israel." (2 Chron. ii. 4.)

THE CHINESE REBELLION.

The more we read of the doctines and doings of the Chinese rebels, the greater is our astonishment at the effects they have already produced, and our uncertainty as to the final results of the movement. Surely, there is a Hand of Providence in the matter, and it is not for man to foresee or foretell what shall be in connection with it.

Some of our Jewish exchanges, we see, are watching the movement with great interest, and publishing the principal documents. In one of them, printed in London—The Hebrew Observer—we find the Ten Commandments of the insurgents, prepared and arranged as follows:—

The Vivifying Power of Judaism.

Once more is the vivifying power of Judaism gloriously manifesting itself. Judaism, which, in the religions of Christians and Mahometans, in past centuries, sent forth beneficent emissaries to a benighted world, has now deputed the "Prince of Peace," in the densely-populated plains of China, to reclaim degraded millions from brutalizing idolatry and debased morality. We have before us several extracts from the religious works used by the so-called Chinese rebels, portions of which we re-produce. When our readers have perused them, we feel assured that they will consider with us the promised regeneration of China as another triumph achieved by the code promulgated admidst the thunders of Sinai.

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS.

The Ten Celestial Commands, which are to be constantly observed:—

THE FIRST COMMAND—Thou shalt honor and worship the great God.

The great God is the universal Father of all men, in every nation under heaven. Every man is produced and nourished by him; every man is also protected by him; every man ought, therefore, morning and evening, to honor and worship him, with acknowledgments of his goodness. It is a common saying, that Heaven produces, nourishes and protects men. Also, that being provided with food we must not deceive Heaven. Therefore whoever does not worship the great God, breaks the commands of Heaven.

The hymn says:—

Imperial Heaven, the Supreme God, is the true spirit (God;)
Worship him every morning and evening, and you will be taken up;
You ought deeply to consider the ten celestial commands,
And not by your foolishness obscure the right principles of nature.

THE SECOND COMMAND—Thou shalt not worship corrupt spirits (gods.)

The great God says: Thou shalt not have other spirits (gods) beside me. Therefore all besides the great God are corrupt spirits (gods,) deceiving and destroying mankind; they must on no account be worshiped; whoever worships the whole class of corrupt spirits (gods,) offends against the commands of Heaven.

The hymn says:—

Corrupt devils very easily delude the souls of men;
If you perversely believe in them, you will at last go down to hell.
We exhort you all, brave people, to awaken from your lethargy,
And early make your peace with your exalted Heavenly Father.

THE THIRD COMMAND—Thou shalt not take the name of the great God in vain.

The name of the great God is Jehovah, which men must not take in vain. Whoever takes God's name in vain, and rails against Heaven, offends against this command.

The hymn says:—

Our exalted Heavenly Father is infinitely honorable:
Those who disobey and profane his name seldom come to a good end.
If unacquainted with the true doctrine, you should be on your guard.
For those who wantonly blaspheme involve themselves in endless crime.

THE FOURTH COMMAND—On the seventh day, the day of worship, you should praise the great God for his goodness.

In the beginning, the great God made heaven and earth, land and sea, men and things, in six days, and having finished his works on the seventh day, he called it the day of rest (or Sabbath,) therefore all the men of the world, who enjoy the blessing of the great God, should on every seventh day specially reverence and worship the great God, and praise him for his goodness.

The hymn says:—

All the happiness in the world comes from Heaven,
It is therefore reasonable that men should give thanks and sing!
At the daily morning and evening meal there should be thanksgiving
But on the seventh day, the worship should be more intense.

THE FIFTH COMMAND—Thou shalt honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be prolonged. Whoever disobeys his parents breaks this command.

The hymn says:—

History records that Shun honored his parents to the end of his days,
Causing them to experience the intensest pleasure and delight;
August Heaven will abundantly reward all who act thus,
And do not disappoint the expectation of the authors of their being.

THE SIXTH COMMAND—Thou shalt not kill or injure men.

The hymn says:—

The whole world is one family, and all men are brethren;
How can they be permitted to kill and destroy one another?
The outward form and the inward principles are both conferred by Heaven:
Allow every one, then, to enjoy the ease and comfort which he desires.

THE SEVENTH COMMAND—Thou shalt not commit adultery, or any thing unclean.

All the men in the world are brethren, and all the women in the world are sisters. Among the sons and daughters of the celestial hall the males are on one side and the females on the other, and are not allowed to intermix. Should either men or women practice lewdness, they are considered outcasts, as having offended against one of the chief commands of Heaven. The casting of amorous glances, the harboring of lustful imaginations, the smoking of foreign tobacco (opium,) or the singing of libidinous songs, must all be considered as breaches of this command.

The hymn says:—

Lust and lewdness constitute the chief transgression;
Those who practice it become outcasts, and are the objects of pity.
If you wish to enjoy the substantial happiness of Heaven,
It is necessary to deny yourself and earnestly cultivate virtue.

THE EIGHTH COMMAND—Thou shalt not rob or steal.

Riches and poverty are determined by the great God, but whosoever robs or plunders the property of others, transgresses the command.

The hymn says:—

Rest contented with your station, however poor, and do not steal;
Robbery and violence are low and abandoned practices;
Those who injure others really injure themselves
Let the noble-minded among you immediately reform.

THE NINTH COMMAND—Thou shalt not utter falsehood.

All those who tell lies, and indulge in devilish deceits, with every kind of coarse and abandoned talk, offend against this command.

The hymn says:—

Lying discourse and unfounded stories must all be abandoned;
Deceitful and wicked words are offenses against Heaven,
Much talk will in the end bring evil on the speakers;
It is then much better to be cautious, and regulate one's own mind.

THE TENTH COMMAND—Thou shalt not conceive a covetous desire.

When a man looks upon the beauty of another's wife or daughters with covetous desires, or when he regards the elegance of another man's possessions with covetous desires, or when he engages in gambling, he offends against this command.

The hymn says:—

In your daily conduct do not harbor covetous desires;
When involved in the sea of lust, the consequences are very serious;
The above injunctions were handed down on Mount Sinai,
And to this day the celestial commands retain all their force.

THE CHILD JESUS LEFT AT JERUSALEM.

The usual rate of traveling in the East is three miles an hour; and as the number of hours devoted to traveling rarely exceeds six or eight hours, the distance of an ordinary day's journey may be considered as twenty or twenty-five miles. The first day, however, on starting on an expedition, forms an exception to this rule; on that day it is not customary to go more than six or eight miles, and the tents are pitched for the first night's encampment almost within sight of the place from which the journey commences. The sun was hanging low as I left Cairo, to proceed across the desert to Syria, and after a march of two hours and a half, we halted near the obelisk which marks the site of Heliopolis, the On of Scripture. We conformed in this respect, as I was told, to the general practice of travelers, in setting forth on this journey. The only reason that I heard assigned for this procedure was, that it furnishes an opportunity if anything has been forgotten, to return to the city and supply the deficiency. This explanation may be the correct one, and at all events agrees with such notices, in books of travels, as the following from Maundrell: "We set out from Aleppo," he says, "at three in the afternoon, intending to make only a short step that evening, in order to prove how well we were provided with necessaries for our journey." But this practice of restricting the first day's journey, in whatever way it may have arisen, has existed apparently from the earliest times; for we find the stations marked in the itineraries of the oldest travelers in the East, agreeing very remarkably with those mentioned by later travelers. The permanency, therefore, so characteristic of Asiatic life in general, may be supposed to have maintained itself in this respect, as it has done in other things. Perhaps we may avail ourselves of this fact, in order to account for an incident in the history of the Saviour, which has appeared to some surprising. I refer to the account of his first visit to Jerusalem at the age of twelve years. The parents of Jesus are said to have traveled a day's journey on their return, without knowing what had become of their son; they were ignorant whether he was in the company or not, and as if indifferent respecting his safety, made no inquiry in regard to him till the close of the day. Certain critics (it is one of Strauss' objections) have represented this as so improbable and unnatural as to throw discredit upon the truth of the entire narrative. But if this first day's journey occupied two or three hours only, the difficulty disappears. They had reason to suppose that he was with some of their relatives or friends who were traveling with them; they could act, naturally enough, under that impression for so short a time, and would have no occasion for anxiety until his continued absence, when they came to halt for the night, aroused their fears. We are informed that when this was the case, they adopted prompt measures to find the missing one; they showed that their having omitted to keep him constantly at their side was owing to anything but a want of that parental care and love, in which the transaction has been said to cause them to appear so deficient. Tradition has fixed on El-Bireh, less than three hours north of Jerusalem, as the place where the "Holy Family" stopped at the close of the first day, and whence they turned back to the city, in order to seek the child, on discovering that he was absent. We can attach, indeed, no historical value to this tradition, but it is instructive in this respect, that it has selected that particular station, because parties traveling to the north of Jerusalem are accustomed to spend the first night there; and in all probability, it has been the resting-place of caravans on that journey from time immemorial. [Hackett.

"FOREVER WITH THE LORD."

"Forever with the Lord!"
Amen. So let it be;
Life from the dead is in that word;
'Tis immortality.
Here is the body pent,
Absent from Him I roam;
Yet nightly pitch my moving tent
A day's march nearer home.

My Father's house on high,
Home of my soul, how near,
At times, to faith's aspiring eye,
Thy golden gates appear!
Ah! then my spirit faints
To reach the land I love:
The bright inheritance of saints,
Jerusalem above.

Yet doubts still intervene,
And all my comfort flies;
Like Noah's dove, I flit between
Rough seas and stormy skies.
Anon the clouds depart,
The winds and waters cease;
While sweetly o'er my gladdened heart
Expands the bow of peace.

"Forever with the Lord!"
Father, if 'tis thy will,
The promise of thy gracious Word
E'en here, to me fulfill.
Be thou at my right hand,
So shall I never fail;
Uphold me, and I needs must stand;
Fight, and I shall prevail.

CURIOUS DEVELOPMENTS.

Not many years since, after the death of a very pious and excellent minister, his papers were examined, and in his private journal was found a list of persons who at different times had left his ministry, with the reasons which had influenced them in doing so. We will conceal the names, but glance at the facts:

No. I. Was a man who never bridled his tongue, but said that his tongue was his own, and thus deceived himself. He told his pastor that he had not been troubled with a doubt of his safety as a Christian for fifteen years. Yet this man was in the habit of lying, of charging his customers twice for goods in his bills, and of putting matters in them which they never had; he was a daily visitor at the tavern, railed constantly against the best members of the church, and ridiculed practical religion as phariseeism. His attendance on public worship, he said, did not tend to the profit of his soul, and so he left.

No. II. Was intoxicated three or four times a week, was cruel to his wife, and neglected his children. He was constantly complaining that the minister did not preach experimentally; that is, he did not preach his experience as consistent with the character of a Christian; on the other hand, he was always bringing him under bondage to the law. It was no matter of surprise to any one that he left.

No. III. Went to another church, because, as he told the minister, the preaching gave him no encouragement to hope for mercy. This man lived in adultery with his wife's sister, and had read the Bible twice from Genesis to Revelations, in search of some text to justify his conduct. His last words to his minister were, "The meeting house is too hot for me, I cannot stand it."

No. IV. Left because the minister preached against dishonest dealings in business, the indulgence of pride, passion, and lying; and would give no countenance to scandal and swearing. He said the minister was always personal in his preaching.

No. V. Was a lady, who was exceedingly offended because the pastor once remarked, that drinking to excess was worse in a woman, than in a man. She was sure the minister was personal and that he meant her.

No. VI. Took offense at a sermon against covetousness, illustrated by the case of Judas, and was sure the minister "aimed at him."

HOSPITALITY.

Hospitality has been recommended on the ground that one may perhaps entertain angels unawares. We would say be courteous to all, for fear, that through forgetfulness or neglect, you may omit some persons who have treated you kindly. Those whom we never saw may have performed good offices to us though strangers. We may have reaped benefits in utter ignorance of their author. If we are not habitually regardful and polite, it may happen, that in word or act, by private speech, or in the public print, we may inflict a wound upon one who has done us signal good; for it is not those with whom we are most intimate, who are sure to serve us best.

A poor orphan boy named Theodore —— was only seven years old when he attracted the notice of a gentleman of fortune and distinction, who was fond of indulging a fancy—a laudable one it was—of doing good by stealth, and making people happy without disclosing the author of the benefaction. He caused the young lad to be well clothed, sent to school, and afterwards educated at a college. Theodore became a distinguished scholar, but was never able all this time to penetrate the secret of his generous friend. His bills were regularly paid, and he himself liberally, though economically supplied with necessary money for his pocket; but he could only see his benefactor in his works. It may be well supposed he did not fail to thank him from the bottom of his heart a thousand times, for he had a tender one; ingratitude was not among his failings.

The first thing, almost, that he did after leaving academic quiet, was to pen a virulent libel on an eminent gentleman, who happened to be identified with a cause against which the society which Theodore frequented, was passionately opposed. Theodore was known to be talented, and to hold a sharp pen; he was therefore naturally pitched upon to deal the assassin's blow. He was in the meantime not acquainted with the merits of the controversy, as few young men are, who get excited in a quarrel; as for the gentleman he was to assault, he knew nothing at all of him, except that he was a celebrated man, and most persons spoke well of him. That was of no consequence, however; his wit and satire were a gift intended doubtless not to be neglected, as their possessors generally think; so he lent himself to the infliction of a foul slander on one he did not know.

The effect of this truculent attack was considerable; for poison will have its operation by whatever hand and on whatever person, it shall be administered. An anonymous libel, like a musket ball, is equally destructive, whether the trigger be pulled by a child or a man; by hired assassin, or a mistaken man of honor. The charges in this case had a certain effect at first, but were afterwards exposed, and proved entirely false.

Two years after this, as Theodore was sitting one morning in his office, he received a letter inviting him to call at No. — in ——— street, at 12 o'clock the next day. He did so; and was then informed by the executor of ———, the excellent man whom he had ignorantly traduced, that he had left him a legacy of five thousand dollars, accompanied with words of encouragement to persevere in his honorable course of honest industry and generous hopes. He was further cut to the heart to learn from the papers of the departed, that it was he also that took the orphan from the gutter, and befriended him as long as he lived, and whose affectionate kindness death itself had been unable to extinguish.

These disclosures sunk down into his heart, and rankled there forever. His guilty secret was felt at times during all his days, aching like an unhealed wound. He went from the executor of his second father an altered man, and made a resolution which he always religiously kept, never to speak ill again of a man he did not know. This was the self-covenant of Theodore. It should be ours; otherwise we may be found as he was, spitting venom on our best earthly friend and benefactor. And we would add to this the advice not to speak harshly of one we know, unless we are certain he deserves the censure, and that it will not produce more harm than good. Thank heaven! the orphan's father of the present narrative never suspected who his secret accuser was, and was therefore saved that severest of all wounds—the sting of ingratitude. TWO WAYS OF DOING A THING.

We were passing leisurely along one of our streets the other evening, watching the sports of a group of youngsters, when our ears were assailed by the sharp, angry tones of a woman:

"Here, you John Smith! come into the house this moment!"

One of the boys just turned his head, giving at the same time a rather unfilial shrug, then resumed his play.

"Do you hear what I say, John Smith? March quick, or you'll catch it, I tell you!"

We rather think Johnny did "catch it," for we heard, after we had passed, a jerk and a slap, accompanied by a smothered yell, as the door was violently slammed to.

We went on our way doubting whether this course of treatment was exactly the best under the circumstances, particularly as the countenance of the lad indicated the greatest good nature.

As we were cogitating the matter, we turned the corner, and came upon another group of lads in front of a house, the door of which at that moment opened.

"Willie," said a mild and pleasant voice.

"Did you call, mother?" asked one of the boys coming on to the sidewalk.

"Yes, my son. It is getting late—have you not played sufficiently to day?"

"I should like to stay out a little longer, if you please."

The mother patted the boy on the head, and smilingly said, "I should not object if it were not past your bed-time. Have you forgotten, Willie, the lines you repeated to me this morning—"

'Early to bed and early to rise,
Make one healthy, happy and wise," chimed in the boy quickly. "Yes, mother, I remember them. Good night, Tommy—good night, Harry," and taking his mother's hand, he went cheerfully into the house.

"This set us again cogitating. Our thoughts run on the laws of kindness and force. What would be their effects on the two lads who had been subjected to them? Is it not the inevitable tendency of the one to beget kindness, amiability, obedience—and of the other obstinacy, ill-temper, disobedience? No one will dispute this, we think.

Men are but children of a larger growth. As with the child, so with the man. You can lead him better with the gentle hand than drive him with the rod [Portland Eclectic.

"I have lived long enough," said Dr. Adam Clarke, "to know that the great secret of happiness consists in never suffering the energies to stagnate." How much truer and wiser is this than the maxim of the effeminate Hindoos: "It is more happy," say they, "to be seated than to walk; it is more happy to sleep than to be awake; but the happiest of all is death."

Life is made up, not of great sacrifices or duties, but of little things, in which smiles and kindness, and small obligations, given habitually, are what win and preserve the heart and secure comfort.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

Our Anniversaries are over, and we will say a few words about them.

First, the number of persons attending was very respectable. We met brethren from Rhode Island, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and the different parts of this State. The number was not so great as it was last year at Plainfield; still there was a goodly gathering, and it was gratifying to see the evidence, which it afforded, of the increasingly deep interest which is felt in all our Societies. But what pleased us quite as much as any thing, was the interest which our convocations awakened in the people of Adams and vicinity. We think we have never been assembled at a place, where the attendance of the members of the church, and their families, was so uniformly good throughout. We were really glad to see it. Every day the house was filled, and all seemed to feel that the time was well and profitably spent.

Second, the Adams people have placed us under great obligations to them. Their hospitalities were performed handsomely, and with the most perfect cordiality. There was no lack of any thing that could contribute to the comfort of the guests. It seemed to give our friends a real pleasure to entertain as many as their houses would hold. The Lord reward them.

Third, the meetings were, throughout, of a pleasant and profitable character. Thank God, our Anniversaries have always been conducted with a good deal of harmony, and we have nothing to record of a contrary nature with regard to the one just now past. The brethren felt it good to be together, and the people of the place felt that the season had been one of profit to them. We are able to testify, that our brethren in that region have always been liberal in their contributions to benevolent enterprises, and our recent meetings have stimulated them to even yet greater liberality. We trust that they will find a rich reward.

The Missionary Society.

The Eleventh Annual Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society was held at Adams Center, Jefferson Co., N. Y., on Fifth-day, Oct. 6, 1853.

The Introductory Discourse was preached by Geo. B. Utter, from 2 Cor. 5: 14, 15—"For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: And that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves but unto Him which died for them, and rose again."

At the conclusion of the discourse, the following original hymn, written for the occasion by Mrs. Lucy M. Carpenter, was sung by the choir.

THE WATCHMEN ANSWERED.

They stood upon earth's farthest bound,
And cried, while darkness deepened round,
"How long! O Lord?" At times it seemed
A radiance o'er that darkness gleamed,
A ray that only made more drear
The pall on China's living bier.

"O Lord, how long! show us a sign
That this strange empire shall be thine."
They asked, and bowed, and seemed to hear,
"The witness of my power is near;
By flood, and flame, and war's dread peal,
And earthquake, I my promise seal."

By flood.[*] Behold, deep calls to deep,
Above their many graves who sleep
Like hidden gems on Sinim's breast,
God's hostages, those martyrs blest,
Waiting in hope the glorious dawn,
By flame, sword, earthquake marshalled on.

By flame.[†] The cry that startles night
Was heard, where blazed the red fire's light;
The angel of destruction knew
His favored hour. The watchmen view
The coming of each promised sign,
And whisper, "Lord, the times are thine."

By sword.[‡] Along the echoing ground
There comes a noise confused, the sound
Of battles fought, and warriors slain,
Their garments rolled in blood and flame;
The stout heart quails, fears seize the strong,
And faith still questions, "Lord, how long?"

Anon earth's mighty pillars shake,[§]
The everlasting hills do quake,
Once and again stroke follows stroke,
As 't were the sleep of ages broke.
"Ye asked a sign, behold, be still,
God's power shall work his sovereign will."

[*] By flood. The number of missionaries buried in Chinese waters during the past six years forms, probably, the most remarkable feature in the history of Chinese Missions.

[†] By flame. The extensive fires which have occurred at the different ports, as well as in the still, unopened cities of the Empire, will be at once recollected, two successive ones of which have taken place during the past winter in the city of Shanghae.

[‡] By sword. It is hardly necessary to allude by note to the present distracted state of the Empire, in consequence of its civil wars.

[§] Earthquakes have succeeded each other with most fearful rapidity and force, since the month of December last.

Shanghae, April 25, 1853.

[The foregoing lines were written according to the date given above, and forwarded by the mail which was lost on its way to Hong Kong. In her letter of June 1st, Mrs. C. says: "Though a different state of things has arisen since, and the lines are hardly applicable to the present times, still, as a sort of exposition of our past feelings, we thought it would be well to forward them even now. Little did any of us then anticipate so apparent a fulfillment, or rather audible response to long-breathed prayers; although it has been my settled conviction, which I remember to have, once, years ago, embodied in a letter to a friend, in reply to various questions of his as to my views of the prospective work of missions in China. Could I add another stanza at this late hour, it would be a song of triumph to Him whose right hand has (so nearly) gotten him the victory."]

The Society was called to order by the President, David Dunn; prayer was offered by Walter B. Gillett; the Constitution was read, and Committees were appointed to nominate officers and audit the Treasurer's account.

The Society then took a recess of one hour for refreshments.

The afternoon session was opened with prayer by S. S. Griswold; after which visiting brethren were invited to participate in the deliberations.

The Treasurer presented an abstract of his Annual Report, showing that the balance in the Treasury at his last Report was $695 63—since which time he has received for general purposes $1627 25, for the proposed mission in Palestine $1101 75, for Canada Mission $9 00, for Honan Jews $48 32, for Education in China $6 00, for Tracts $2 00, for Home Missions $4 25; total, $3497 20. The actual disbursements had been $1213 84, showing a balance in the Treasury at the present time of $2283 36, of which $997 20 is in favor of the proposed Mission to Palestine, and $300 is a bequest to the Society from Benedict W. Rogers. The Treasurer also stated, that a letter of credit for £300, or about fifteen hundred dollars, payable at sight, had been sent to our missionaries in China, for which the Treasury is of course responsible.

The Annual Report of the Executive Board was then read by the Corresponding Secretary, and accepted by the Society.

On a motion that it be adopted and printed, interesting remarks were made by James Bailey of Little Genesee, N. Y., in which he reviewed our missionary operations during the past few years, and alluded to some of the evidences that our own growth has been in proportion to our efforts in that cause.

Nathan V. Hull followed. He did not consider that missionary efforts should be regulated by actual or prospective successes, although success was sure to follow all efforts put forth in obedience to divine requirements, and in accordance with divine instructions. The general principle upon which missions should be conducted, was alluded to, and numerous illustrations were presentd of the necessary consequences of acting upon this principle. In the course of these remarks, the notion that successes and majorities are evidences of divine approbation, was pretty thoroughly overhauled and shown to be unsound. In conclusion, the people were urged to be at their posts, and perform their several parts, in full assurance that God will bring about, through their instrumentality, his own glorious purposes and the best interests of the world.

Remarks were also made by John Maxson of De Ruyter, Sherman S. Griswold, Lucius Crandall, Joel Greene, and others; after which the Report was unanimously adopted.

A series of resolutions were here introduced by the Corresponding Secretary, which were taken up in order, and after remarks by several individuals, were unanimously adopted, as follows:—

1. Resolved, That the preservation of our missionaries through another year of anxiety and toil, their continued good health, and the self-sacrificing earnestness with which they have prosecuted their labors, demand from us the sincerest expressions of gratitude to our Heavenly Father, and our most fervent prayers that they may long be spared to labor in the vineyard of the Lord.

2. Resolved, That the extraordinary revolution now progressing in China, embodying so much of the religious element as it does, impresses us with the hope that God is about to open that vast Empire to the labors of the missionary, and that the time is not distant when the restraints imposed by heathen idolatry upon free inquiry shall be completely removed.

3. Resolved, That in view of the signs of the times, as indicated in the present condition of the nations of the earth, Seventh-day Baptists are called upon to cultivate a spirit of self-sacrificing devotion to their Lord and Master, and to hold themselves in readiness to enter upon the many fields of labor that are fast whitening to the harvest.

4. Resolved, That we are debtors to all classes of men—to the scattered and oppressed children of Abraham, as well as to the heathen world; also to the victims of delusion and false religion every where; and that, God giving us grace, we will avail ourselves of all suitable opportunities for publishing to the world of mankind the way of salvation by Jesus Christ.

5. Resolved, That the Society, in the prosecution of its work in foreign lands, will aim to give the heathen such versions of the Scriptures as most faithfully conform to the inspired originals.

6. Resolved, That in the death of Bro. James H. Cochran, one of the Vice Presidents of this Society, which took place at Plainfield, N. J, on the 1st of February last, and also in the death of Bro. Benedict W. Rogers, one of its Directors, on the 3d of May last, the Missionary Society has sustained a sad and afflictive bereavement; and that, while we bow with submission to the appointment of an all-wise Providence, we regard it as a renewed admonition to us, who were their companions in labor, to do with our might what our hands find to do, since there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, to which we are all going.

After the adoption of the sixth resolution, on suggestion, prayer was offered by Nathan V. Hull.

The Committee to Nominate Officers made a report, which was adopted, as follows:—

President—David Dunn, of New Market, N. J

Vice Presidents:

Wm. B. Maxson, Halsey H. Baker,
Eli S. Bailey, Thomas B. Stillman,
Nathan V. Hull, Sherman S. Griswold,
James Bailey, Wm. Dunn,
Truman Saunders, Alfred B. Burdick,
Walter B. Gillett, Edwin R. Maxson.

Corresponding Secretary—Thos. B. Brown, New York.
Recording Secretary—Geo. B. Utter, New York.
Treasurer—A. D. Titsworth, Plainfield, N. J.
Directors—Lucius Crandall, Randolph Dunham, John D. Titsworth, Clarke Rogers, Isaac D. Titsworth.

Near evening the Society adjourned to meet at Little Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y, on the fifth day of the week before the third Sabbath in September, 1854, at which time Lucius Crandall is to preach the introductory discourse.

The Tract Society.

The American Sabbath Tract Society held its Tenth Anniversary on Sixth-day morning, Oct. 7.

After prayer by Rowse Babcock, the President, Nathan V. Hull, introduced the proceedings by remarks upon the position and duties of Seventh-day Baptists. He commenced by expressing his fear that many Sabbath-keepers are unnecessarily, and even sinfully, timid about presenting their peculiar sentiments in public and in private. This results, he thought, in most cases, from an over-solicitude not to come in conflict with the opinions of others. But public confidence and esteem, instead of being increased by this course, is more frequently diminished. Anybody whose good opinion is worth having would rather see a man stand firmly by his principles, than wave them to accommodate and conciliate the feelings of others. At the present time, there is great encouragement for Sabbath-keepers to be bold and diligent in disseminating their views. There is a general loss of confidence in the sabbatic character of Sunday—such as not only affords encouragement to labor, but ought to inspire confidence of the final triumph of truth. In conclusion, he urged Sabbath-keepers to stand by the Society which is laboring to extend a knowledge of their views, and to hold up the hands of its agents and colporteurs in the prosecution of their arduous work.

Committees were then appointed to nominate Officers and audit the Treasurer's Accounts; after which the Treasurer presented his report, showing that he had received during the past year $949 94, and that there is now a balance in the Treasury of $400 12; of which $200 is a bequest from Benedict W. Rogers.

The Annual Report of the Board was then read by the Corresponding Secretary. It gives a full account of the operations during the past year, showing that some half a dozen persons have been occupied to some extent in distributing the Society's publications, and that Eld. Lucius Crandall has spent about half of the past year in the service of the Society, visiting the churches, distributing and selling publications, lecturing on the subject of the Sabbath, &c. As this Report will soon be printed in full, it is not deemed necessary to say more of it here.

On a motion to adopt the Report, Lucius Crandall remarked somewhat at length, giving the particulars of a Sabbath discussion he had recently held at Clarkville, N. Y., with a Methodist clergyman named Crawford. He was followed by Wm. B. Maxson and Sherman S. Griswold, in remarks calculated to show the state of public feeling on the subject of the Sabbath, and to encourage Sabbath-keepers to increased activity in disseminating their views. John Maxson of De Ruyter also spoke upon the motion, urging the importance of employing as colporteurs and lecturers men of first-rate abilities and address, capable of presenting the subject in its true light, and commending the Sabbath to the favorable consideration of inquiring men.

The following resolutions were introduced and adopted, after being made the subject of interesting remarks by several individuals, among whom were W. B. Gillett, Leman Andrus, B. F. Chester, T. B. Stillman, L. Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson and John Maxson:

Resolved, That the unsettled state of the public mind on the subject of the Sabbath, as indicated by the conflicting and mutually destructive character of the arguments by which it is attempted to maintain the supposed claims of the first day of the week, not only invites Sabbath-keepers to disseminate their views, but devolves upon them an imperative obligation to be increasingly diligent in that work.

Resolved, That this Society recommends its Board to furnish Tracts gratuitously for distribution by Sabbath-keeping ministers and brethren in their journeyings, and recommends such persons to supply themselves with our publications, for distribution as they have opportunity.

Resolved, That while we urge Sabbath-keepers to greater diligence in disseminating their views, we also urge upon them the importance of making their labors in this way a subject of frequent and earnest prayer.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the several churches to raise funds for the purchase of Tracts, and to appoint suitable agents to distribute them, when they may find inviting and promising fields.

Resolved, That it be recommended to our people always to designate the days of the week by their respective numerals, except that, when speaking of the seventh, they designate it as the Sabbath.

Resolved, That the Executive Board be directed to take into consideration the propriety of republishing the old works of Sabbatarian writers, especially those on the subject of the Sabbath.

The question having been raised whether it would not be expedient to unite the Tract Society with the Publishing Society, and have one organization do the duties now done by both, the subject was, after considerable remark, referred to the Board of the Tract Society for further consideration, to be reported upon at the next Anniversary.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:—

President—Nathan V. Hull.

Vice Presidents:

I. D. Titsworth, S. S. Griswold,
Wm. M. Rogers, A. B Spaulding,
G. Tomlinson, Jared Kenyon,
A. D. Titsworth, Varnum Hull,
Jas. Bailey.

Recording Secretary—T. B. Brown, of New York.
Corresponding Secretary—Geo. B. Utter, of N. York.
Treasurer—Thomas B. Stillman, of New York.

Directors:

Walter B. Gillett, John D. Titsworth,
Lucius Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson,
David Dunn.

The Publishing Society.

The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society held its Fourth Anniversary in the afternoon of Sixth-day, Oct. 7.

After the usual introductory exercises, the Treasurer's Report was read, showing that the receipts of the Society during the last year were $3674 21, while the expenses were $3832 24.

The Annual Report of the Board of Managers was then read by the Corresponding Secretary. It represented the affairs of the Society's weekly, monthly, and quarterly publications—The Sabbath Recorder, The Sabbath-School Visitor, and The Seventh-day Baptist Memorial—as being in a very satisfactory condition; also, that the Board have in preparation four original works, which will probably be issued at no distant day, one a volume of sermons by Seventh-day Baptist ministers, and another a book of hymns and music for the use of Sabbath-Schools. In the matter of the proposed denominational building in New York, the Report stated that a subscription had been opened, and about $1850 subscribed.

Pending a motion for the adoption of the Report, remarks were made by W. B. Gillett, A. B. Burdick, L. Crandall, N. V. Hull, Wm. B. Maxson, Leman Andrus, and others.

Bro. Gillett's remarks had reference to the proposed volume of sermons by Seventh-day Baptist ministers, designed, among other things, to aid in keeping up Sabbath meetings in neighborhoods where stated preaching is not enjoyed. The importance of the work, and the duty of the ministry to give it their aid, were clearly set forth and insisted upon.

Bro. Burdick spoke of the plan entertained by the Board, and suggested in the Report, to increase the editorial corps of the Sabbath Recorder, by securing corresponding editors in different sections of the denomination, with a view of making the paper as complete a record as possible of what is transpiring among all the churches—a plan which he considered feasible and sure to be useful.

Bro. Crandall and several others remarked upon the importance of having in New York a building for the accommodation of the Publishing Society, with rooms appropriated to the use of the Tract and Missionary Societies. In the course of these remarks it was proposed that an opportunity should be given for making additional subscriptions for the object on the spot. Slips of paper were accordingly circulated, and about one thousand dollars were subscribed.

A resolution was then passed, expressing the Society's appreciation of the importance of the undertaking to secure a Denominational Building, and requesting the Board to continue their efforts to complete it.

At this stage in the meeting, Eld. Elias Burdick presented a paper in relation to the publication of books by the Society, which paper was read, and ordered printed in the Sabbath Recorder.

The following list of officers for the ensuing year were then elected; after which the Society adjourned, to meet at Little Genesee, N. Y., in September, 1854, on such day as the Board shall determine and notify.

Vice Presidents:

Nathan V. Hull, Wm. B. Maxson.

Of the remaining exercises connected with the Anniversaries—(the meeting of the Educational Committee on First-day, and the Missionary Conference on the evening following)—we are compelled to defer a notice till next week. We will conclude for the present by saying, that in addition to the exercises above alluded to, there was preaching in the evenings following fifth, sixth, and seventh days, also twice on the Sabbath, and once on First-day.

THE NORTH-WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist North-Western Association convened with the Church in Walworth, Walworth Co., Wis., September 22d, 23d and 25th. The introductory discourse was preached by Wm. M. Jones, traveling agent of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society, from Rom. 11: 30, 31—"For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief; even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy." The discourse was designed to show the duty of Christians to send the gospel to others, and to awaken a missionary spirit among the churches. The claims of the Mission to Palestine, recently undertaken by the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Board, were ably presented. The brethren and sisters were enabled to see their duty in a good degree, and by their contributions plainly indicated that they had a mind for the work.

The Association was organized by appointing Stillman Coon of Milton, Moderator, and H. B. Lewis and Nathan Maxson, Secretaries.

The communications from the churches showed an increase in numbers and interest in the cause of reform. One church has been organized during the year, and was received into the Association, viz., Dakota.

Wm. M. Jones, agent of the Missionary Board, was present and participated in the deliberations. Hiram Babcock of Hebron, Pa., was present a delegate from the Western Association, and took part in the doings of the Association. H. P. Green and others were present as visiting brethren.

The delegation in attendence was large, while the attendance of our brethren and sisters in Walworth, from the first, plainly showed that they fully appreciate the great movements of the denomination.

In the early part of the session, a Committee was appointed to draft and present resolutions for discussion during the session. We give the resolutions which were adopted:—

1. Resolved, That the spirit of Missions is an inherent dictate of the gospel of Christ; that it is impossible to love God and at the same time feel indifferent to the salvation of our fellow men.

2. Resolved, That the blessings which have thus far attended our China Mission, call for devout gratitude and thanksgiving to the God of Missions.

3. Resolved, That the signs of the times in China should encourage us to increased vigor and faithfulness in the prosecution of the work to which we have put our hands in that country.

4. Resolved, That we hail with joy the prospect before us of the speedy establishment of a Mission in Palestine, and that we will stay up the hands of the Missionary Board by our prayers and contributions.

5. Resolved, That as the home field is now white and ready for the harvest, it is imperatively our duty to occupy that field to the extent of our ability, and especially to care for the feeble Sabbath settlements within our borders.

6 Whereas, the mass of professed Christians are in the work of Missions, as well as in their church relations, connected with Slavery—therefore, Resolved, That we look upon such connections as an alarming evil, and feel ourselves called upon to adhere strictly to the principle of Free Missions, and to labor and pray for a speedy divorce of the church from this monster sin.

7. Resolved, That Slavery, as it exists under the government of the United States, is an unmitigated wrong, a violation of every principle of religion and humanity, and a fearful sin against God; and that the man that gives his sympathy or support by his vote, commits a grievous sin.

8. Resolved, That the so-called Fugitive Slave Law is justly called the sum of all villainies, a refinement of wickedness reserved for this age of refinement and intelligence, and that it is the duty of the church to oppose and denounce it by every means in her power.

9. Resolved, That to vote for any man known to approve that Law, and to favor its continuance, for the office of President of the United States, or for any other office legitimately and constitutionally connected with its repeal or continuance, is to give it sympathy and support.

10. Resolved, That to support Slavery or the Fugitive Slave Law, by the action of voting, is as great and as provoking a sin as to support it by any other action, and as legitimately subject to the discipline of the church as any other sin.

11. Resolved, That we regard the use of tobacco as an injurious, disgusting, filthy, and wasteful practice, and altogether inconsistent with the requirements of the gospel.

12. Resolved, That the growing sin of intemperance, as it exists in this State, presents before us a painful picture, as it bleaches from the heart of the victim every principle of humanity, and disqualifies him for every relation of life, leaving him a disgrace to mankind, a pest to society, and an enemy to the social, political, and family relations of life.

13. Resolved, That the present issue brought before the electors of this State, by our last Legislature, in submitting the Anti-Liquor Law to them, is an important one, and that no ordinary excuse will justify us in absenting ourselves from the polls on the appointed day, and voting on that question.

14. Resolved, That to vote against the suppression of the liquor traffic is to vote for the manufacture of drunkards, widows, and orphans, and to keep open a gateway to hell.

The discussions on the foregoing resolutions were interesting and stirring, and were freely participated in by the ministering brethren present, and others. The remarks on the fourth resolution were peculiarly touching, as were evidenced by the falling tear from nearly every eye in the audience. They were followed by the following resolution:—

Resolved, That we receive with pleasure brother and sister Jones among us, and fully sympathize with the Missionary Board in the confidence they have reposed in them.

The remarks touching the elective franchise showed fully that the brethren of this Association realize the obligation to do ALL for the glory of God and the good of man.

The Report on the State of Religion showed that revivals had been enjoyed by some of the churches, and the interest in the cause of Christ increasing. The Report of the Board of Education showed that a commodious Academy is being erected within the bounds of the Association, and the cause of education progressing.

V. Hull and A. W. Coon were appointed delegates to the Anniversaries in Adams, N. Y. A. W. Coon was appointed delegate to the Eastern, Central, and Western Associations, at their next sessions.

The next session of this Association will be held with the church in Milton, Rock Co., Wis., to commence on the fourth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in September, 1854.

A discourse was preached on Fifth-day evening by H. P. Green of Genesee, N. Y. On Sixth-day evening by Hiram W. Babcock of Hebron, Pa. On Sabbath morning the congregation listened to a discourse from H. W. Babcock. In the afternoon, to one from Stillman Coon. On Seventh-day evening, preaching by A. W. Coon. On First-day morning, by V. Hull. In the afternoon, by Wm. M. Jones. In the evening, by J. M. Todd. The preaching throughout was marked by deep-toned feeling, and was well calculated to arouse the church and delegates to action, and to alarm and instruct the sinner. This was followed by hearty confessions and exhortations from the laity, and we trust a feeling of religious interest was commenced which may result in a general revival of the work of God.

On motion of V. Hull, it was—

Resolved, That it be the duty of the Recording Secretary to prepare a synopsis of the doings of this Association, together with the resolutions adopted, and forward the same to the Sabbath Recorder for publication.

H. B. Lewis, Rec. Sec.

Albion, Sept. 29, 1853.

Astor Library.—At a late convention of librarians (says the Independent) an invitation from Dr. Cogswell was accepted to visit the Astor Library. The building is not yet wholly finished in the embellishment of the interior; and the visitors found the librarian and his assistants busy in arranging a lot of books, some 20,000 volumes or thereabouts, lately received from Europe. It is expected that the library will be opened by New Year's, when a most choice collection of 80,000 books will be made accessible, selected for the purpose by one of the most accomplished bibliographers of the age, and arranged on a simple and scientific principle that will greatly facilitate consultation. A correspondent of the Christian Register thus describes the arrangement:—

"The lower part of the south side of the hall is history; the different alcoves each taking a different department. Above them in the same division of alcoves are the belles-lettres, which belong to the countries whose history is written below. If you are examining Lingard or Hume down stairs, you have just above you Shakspeare and Waverley; or if you are reading the 'History of the Reformation'—within a few steps above are the treasures of German Literature.

"The north side takes Science, Theology, Morals and Law. Medicine and Natural History, and the other Physical Sciences, have each their alcoves. Philology ranks as a science, and receives the classics on this side—in the view that their language rather than their subject gives them their special interest with most readers. A whole alcove is devoted to dictionaries and grammars—and another to Bibliographical works—the tools of the librarian.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Desecration.

Glasgow, September 23d, 1853.

The Emperor steamboat, and its Sunday sailing, will have the consideration of the higher Government officials. The Procurator Fiscal of Dumbarton was last week in Glasgow, taking evidence relative to the obstructions which have been put in the way of landing the steamer's passengers at Gareloch-head, by Sir James Colquhoun of Luss, Lord Lieutenant of the County of Dumbarton. The passengers have forcibly effected debarkation; and two of them, on the first occasion, were made prisoners, charged with breaking the pier gate. The men were liberated on bail; and the whole question of the right of the public to land on Sundays by private piers, in despite of the proprietors, and even the right of proprietors to erect, or at least to exact toll at such piers has thus been raised, and is now likely to have a legal decision. The steamer, in defiance of all obstructions, has, meanwhile, continued its trips; and Sir James has this week applied to the Court of Session for an interdict to prevent their landing in the Gareloch. The Lord Ordinary, Rutherford, has refused to act summarily in the case, but has required the owners of the steamer to give in replies. The question seems to apply exclusively to private piers—the Harbor Trustees, both of Glasgow and Greenock, having openly declared, however reluctantly on the part of the latter, that they have no power to prevent any from landing at their quays on Sunday or any other day. And it is confidently asserted, by men who seem competent to speak on the subject, that as no individual can form erections in the sea or on the seashore without parliamentary authority, and that no Act has been obtained for the resisting piers to exact toll, that no obligation rests on any one to pay toll during the week. On this ground, a gentleman has taken out summonses, within these few days, against the tacksman of Dunoon pier, for refusing to allow him to pass without payment, and which was expected to be decided, shortly, by the Sheriff. It is probable that the whole question will fall to depend on the decision of the Lord Ordinary, in the case now before him. There is reason to expect that Sir James Colquhoun will be found in fault, since, apart from the question of the legality of exacting tolls, the toll was actually tendered by passengers, and refused. Even on the wider ground of Sunday desecration, it is questionable if there be a law which will prevent the Sunday sailing of a pleasure steamer—so extensive a desecration not having been contemplated, probably, in the days when the framing of Sunday laws was more approved. The result of the opposition, is, therefore, likely to be, that, henceforth, pleasure sailing will form part of the testimony in favor of Sunday, arising from general observance.

Last month a meeting at Dublin, presided over by Judge Crampton, presented an address to the Directors of the Dublin and Kingston Railway, requesting modestly that on Sunday there should be a cessation of the traffic "from eleven o'clock in the forenoon to some time in the afternoon," and that they should "cause at least some rest to be made." A special meeting of the Board was called to consider the matter, who stated in reply that they "deeply feel the importance of the subject, and regret that they have not been able to carry into effect the views of the parties whose names were appended to the address." Bradshaw will therefore continue to intimate of this line, "Sunday trains run same as on week days." At the Half-Yearly Meeting of the Caledonian Railway Co., held here this week, Mr. Meiklum, who had, at last meeting, given notice of a motion for discontinuing Sunday trains upon the line, asked the Chairman why it was not mentioned on this occasion in the Report? The Chairman replied that the Directors had ascertained that they were not bound to put it in. And although themselves wishful to avoid as much as possible Sunday traffic, they could not but bear in mind that two-thirds of the shareholders are Englishmen, who, annoyed by the continual discussion of this subject at the Board, were determined, if this were persisted in, that they would move for Sunday pleasure excursion trains to be run upon the line—"and if they do press that motion they will unquestionably carry it." In farther reply, the Chairman said Mr. M. might get a tenth of the shareholders to make request, and, according to the Act, a special meeting would be called to consider the matter. Mr. M. moved an amendment, that the Report be not adopted until the goods and passenger traffic be stopped on Sundays. He spoke of the Railway having set an example which had been followed by Sunday milk-carts, cabs, and omnibuses, until now we have a pleasure steamboat sailing every Sunday. The religious public, he said, were now aroused, and would not rest till they abolished all Sunday traffic, and even the Pagan name of Sunday, as applied to the Sabbath. As he did not seem to have any objection to the continuance of the Pagan name of Monday, so neither did he show that it is the Sabbath to which the name of Sunday is applied. He had evidence of the little effect that his argument had on the Railway public in the fact that his amendment was rejected by a majority of 30 against 4. By this discovery of the Directors, our Sunday friends who bought their shares for the express purpose of making speeches in favor of Sunday sanctification at the Half-Yearly Meetings, will lose the opportunities of which they have so largely availed themselves. At Birmingham there was a meeting this week of a Sunday Observance Society, from which it appears, if the speeches are to be credited, that that town holds preëminence in desecrating the day which the church desires to have sanctified. Besides the pleasure trains, which the Great Western Railway Co. refuse to lessen, and the Sunday cabs—which the reverend speakers contended clergymen cannot always do without—there is a large and increasing number of shops engaged in the Sunday traffic. The Athenæum last month, noticing the erection of a new Hall at Salford, to be used conjointly by the Athenæum of the town and the Temperance Society, remarks, "Among the terms of the amalgamation we notice the 7th clause, containg a new element as applied to such institutes as these, namely, that there shall be no clause in the trust deed compelling the institution to be closed on the Sundays," another sign of progress towards the restoration of Sunday to its proper place as one of "the six working days." That time has not yet arrived, however, as we are occasionally reminded. Last month we were informed that Abraham Jackson, a Jew outfitter at Shields, has been sentenced to pay five shillings and costs, or to sit for four hours in the stocks, for not observing the Sunday as well as the Sabbath.

THE SABBATH AND THE LORD'S DAY.—The Independent notices at length a restored work of Hyppolitus, which throws much light upon the doctrines and practices of the early Christian Churches. The following extract shows what a distinction was formerly made between the Sabbath and the Lord's Day—a distinction which modern writers have labored hard to obliterate:—

The Sunday was, in those early days, no sombre or even Jewish day of ceremony. In the incessant toil of life among men who despised their faith, and scorned its Author, it came in sweetly and joyously as the day when the happiest of all events to them was consummated—the Resurrection of Christ. It was in no way, either in its origin or in its mode of observance, confounded with the Jewish Sabbath. "Keep the Sabbath," (i. e., Saturday,) says our old Book, (p. 76,) "and the Lord's Day Festival; because the former is the memorial of the Creation, and the latter of the Resurrection." "If any one of the Clergy be found to fast on the Lord's Day, or on the Sabbath Day, excepting one only, let him be deprived; but if he be one of the Laity, let him be suspended." P. 117. "Let the Servants work five days, (p. 94,) but the Sabbath and the Lord's Day let them have leisure for the Church, that they may be taught Piety in the service of God. On the Sabbath the Lord rested from all the work of Creation, which he had finished; the Lord's Day is a day of rest on account of the Resurrection of the Lord." "On the day of the Resurrection of the Lord, that is, the Lord's Day, assemble yourselves together, without fail, giving thanks to God, and praising him for those mercies he has bestowed upon you through Christ," &c. P. 76.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN CANADA.—The following official statement, from the Quebec Gazette, indicates that the papal influence in Canada is exerting itself for the overthrow, so far as possible, of religious liberty:—

"Before Alexis Derouselle and Jean Baptist Parant, Esqs., Justices of the Peace, residing in the parish of Beauport. 4th June, 1853.

"Narcisse Filiau of Beauport was summoned on complaint of Laurent Gosselie of Beauport, constable, 'for having, on Sunday, the 29th May last, being the day of the procession, behaved himself in a disorderly manner at the door of the Beauport church, by keeping his hat on his head during the procession of the Most Holy Sacrament, which was then proceeding from the church to the neighboring chapel, and by telling the said constable that he had no right or authority to compel him to take his hat off, and that he would keep it on in spite of him—then and there bringing into contempt the authority of the said constable.'

"Filiau, having been tried on the novel accusation, was convicted and fined five shillings, and twenty-one shillings and threepence costs, with imprisonment not exceeding eight days till paid, should his goods and chattels prove insufficient to meet the amount."

THE OLDEST BAPTIST CHURCH IN AMERICA.—A correspondent of the Christian Chronicle, writing from Newport, R. I., says of the first Baptist church in that city:—

Though usually bearing the date of 1644, it was really constituted in 1638, and is the oldest Baptist church in America. It stands a monument of the preserving care of God; for it is the only church in all New England that has existed for over two hundred and fifteen years, that has not departed from its original faith; every other church in New England of the same age having gone over to Unitarianism. Its founder and first pastor was the distinguished Dr. John Clark, the original projector of the settlement on the island; the man who, in 1651, with Obadiah Holmes and John Crandall, was imprisoned in Boston, and condemned to a fine, or to be whipped, for preaching Baptist sentiments in Massachusetts. It was he, too, by his own unaided but persevering efforts, who obtained that distinguished charter of Rhode Island, the root of our American liberties—securing perfect liberty of conscience to all. Though this church has existed two hundred and fifteen years, it has had but thirteen pastors, including Rev. S. Adlam, its present successful incumbent; and a large proportion of its present members are descended from those who first constituted the church."

The Board of Trust for Norwich (Vt.) University have decided to move the Institution to Montpelier, the privilege being granted by charter to establish it in any town east of the Green Mountains. At the annual meeting in August it was voted to move it there, in case the citizens of the town would subscribe $10,000 for buildings. That sum has been pledged, and $5,000 more.

Richard Hildreth, Esq., closes the chapter on "Knowledge" in the new work entitled "Theory of Politics," with the observation that "there were more ideas in the head of Thomas Jefferson alone, than in all Virginia at this moment."

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

An excited controversy is going on at Pittsburgh, Pa., with reference to the propriety of permitting omnibuses to continue their trips through the streets on Sunday the same as other days. Some of the omnibus proprietors, who have attempted to establish the custom, have been prosecuted; and the propriety of the measure is discussed by all the newspapers of that place, religious and secular.

The Syracuse Standard says that the will of the late David Hinsdale, of Camillus, which has just been admitted to probate, contains, among others, the following bequests: To the Orphan Asylum of the County of Onondaga, $500; to the Home for the Friendless, in Syracuse, about $400; to the American Bible Society, $500; to the American Home Missionary Society, $600.

The London City Mission is the largest society of the kind in the world. It employed last year no less than 297 missionaries, who were constantly engaged in domiciliary visitation. The number of visits they made during the year was 1,240,318, and they distributed 1,766,131 religious tracts.

At the stated monthly meeting of the Executive Committee of the American Tract Society, the sum of $20,000 in cash was appropriated for the current year, to be divided among the various foreign missions.

It is remarkable that all the Wesleyan bodies this year report a decrease: Primitive Methodists, 1,000; New Connection Methodists, 500; Association Methodists, 1,200; the old body, 10,000.

Harry Hill, a well-known cotton merchant and liberal-hearted Methodist, is building a Methodist tabernacle in New Orleans, in an eligible position, at a cost of $150,000. It is to be capable of seating 3,000.

Henry Whittlesey, Esq., of Catskill, who died April 28, left $500, to be paid immediately, to the New York Colonization Society, and $10,000, to be divided, after his widow's death, among seven benevolent societies.

Rev. S. S. Day, of the Teloogoo Mission, arrived in New York in the Washington, on the 29th ult., and Rev. Dr. Dean, of the Hong-Kong Mission, in the America at Boston, on the 1st inst., both in improved health.

At a late meeting of the American Bible Society, a letter was read from Gov. Brigham Young, of Utah, acknowledging the receipt of a donation of Bibles from that Society, and requesting more.

California News.

The steamship Star of the West arrived at New York on Sunday, Oct. 9, bringing San Francisco dates to Sept. 16. The news principally relates to the election, which has just closed.

The State elections took place on the 7th ult., and resulted in the success of the Democratic ticket by a small majority. Gov. Bigler is reëlected, and both branches of the Legislature have a large Democratic majority.

The Weaverville correspondent of the Shasta Courier mentions two cases of death by violence in that place. One was a Frenchman who was struck on the head with a club by a hotel keeper. The poor fellow went away and was found dead next morning. The other was the result of a rencontre between the Sheriff and a prisoner. The prisoner attempted to stab the Sheriff, when the latter shot him.

The express box of Adams & Co. was stolen from the stage as it was on its way from Sonora to Stockton. The box contained some $25,000, as it is supposed, for it took two men to lift it from the ground. The stage driver did not discover the robbery until he had reached the river, when he perceived that the straps had been cut and all the baggage, &c., missing.

A person named John Potter, alias "Baltimore Jack," was killed in a fracas at Downieville, by another man named Muntz. The latter is said to have acted in self-defense.

The world-renowned mountain Kit Carson is now in Sacramento, and quite a lion. He brought a drove of sheep from New Mexico, which, it is said, he sold by the flock for $32,000.

Dr. Downes recently shot a man named Duval, in Sacramento.

Three wagons and about 400 head of cattle had arrived from the Plains and crossed at the ferry on their way to Sonoma Valley.

A fire occurred in the mining town of Volcano, Calaveras County, on Sunday, Sept. 11, which destroyed a hotel and other property to the amount of about $10,000.

A battle has been fought with the Indians, at Evan's Creek, in which 10 Indians and 3 whites were killed.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—On Sunday night, Oct. 2, says the Cattaraugus Whig, Mr. Geo. Bostwick, of Ashford, who has for some time past been engaged in buying cattle and driving them east, started from Springville, to walk to Ashford. After proceeding nearly 4 miles on his way, he was overtaken by a horse and buggy, in which were two men. One of them, after some little conversation, got out of the buggy, remarking that he was chilly, and would walk with him. He almost immediately seized Bostwick, threw him upon the ground, and by the help of his companion, who came to his assistance, gagged him by stuffing his mouth full of paper, bound him hand and foot, tied him to a tree by the roadside, and robbed him of all the money he had about him, amounting to something over $330, in bank bills and silver—this done, the robbers decamped, leaving him bound hand and foot, and unable to make any noise whatever. By wetting and compressing the paper in his mouth he succeeded in making noise sufficient to arrest the attention of one of his neighbors, who was passing about two hours afterward, by whom he was relieved from his unpleasant situation. From several strong circumstances connected with the affair, suspicion fell upon two individuals at Springville, named Shultes and Burnett, as the probable perpetrators of the outrage. On hearing that they were suspected, they caused Mr. Bostwick to be arrested, and made oath that he hired them to rob him. As no motive can be conceived for a man's hiring himself to be robbed, and otherwise roughly handled, this act of the persons suspected tends only to confirm the suspicion of their guilt. Measures have been taken to bring the matter before the Grand Jury now in session, for investigation.

ACCIDENT ON THE HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD.—On Saturday evening at about 9 o'clock, a cattle train from Albany ran into the 5 o'clock milk train from the same place, which was switched off near Tivoli, Dutchess Co. There was some misunderstanding as to the switching off at this place, one of the employees mistaking the order of Mr. Decker, the switch-tender, and when the 7 o'clock down express train came along, another collision took place. The last collision occurred at 9½ o'clock P. M., and resulted in the smashing up of the express engine "Putnam," which ran off the track toward the river, the engine and tender jamming up the baggage car, with little injury, however, to the baggage. The engineer of the express train, Mr. Pierson, was thrown from the engine into the river, cutting his hand and badly brusing his hip, and a fireman named Abraham Folan, of Schodack, received a very severe contusion in the lower part of the abdomen, and his back was also severely injured. A New York lady who was returning from Montreal, C. E., with her husband, who was sitting near the door at the forward part of the car, was pitched head forward with her infant in her arms against the side of a closet, and is said to have received serious injury and to have broken one of her ribs. The three trains were all bound down the road to New York. An emigrant passenger car in the rear of the cattle train was stove in by the express engine, and smashed to atoms, together with one or two cattle cars. Several beeves and calves were killed and many injured by the violence.

PENNSYLVANIA AGRICURTURAL FAIR.—The State Fair at Pittsburgh was attended by an immense concourse of persons. The accounts state that from thirty to fifty thousand spectators visited the exhibition daily. The cars of the Pennsylvania Railroad, running to the grounds, were all densely thronged, as were also omnibuses and all other vehicles. It seemed a holiday in Pittsburgh, the whole population having turned out for enjoyment. Every avenue to the fair was crowded from morning to night, and the fair presented one dense mass of well-dressed men, women, and children. The number of strangers in Pittsburgh was immense, and was, in fact, limited only by the means of getting there. The majority were from Western Pennsylvania and Eastern Counties of Ohio, comparatively few being from east of the mountains.

SUMMARY.

Gen. O. Hinton, the celebrated Ohio mail robber, who was arrested some two or three years since in Ohio, and afterwards released on bail and left the country, forfeiting his bail bond, has been arrested in California. He first went to Cuba, then to California, and afterward to Oregon, where he kept a public house for some time. Lately, however, he has been sojourning in California, under the assumed name of Samuel G. Gordon, but was recognized by a former citizen of Columbus as the veritable Hinton. It is understood that he will shortly be brought back to Ohio for trial.

A dispatch dated St. John, N. B., Saturday, Oct. 8, says: The steamer Fairy Queen was lost last night, between Pictou Island and the Main. Two passengers, eight of the crew, and all the officers saved themselves, but left eleven passengers to their fate. Eight of the passengers afterward floated ashore on the wreck. Mr. Ely Cameron, one of the passengers saved, saw three ladies sink. The captain and crew have been arrested, to await the result of an investigation.

The Indians have been very troublesome in Utah, killing many persons. The Governor has issued a proclamation calling all the military forces of the Territory into service. He has also ordered a wall to be built around the city 20 feet high and 8 thick, with a ditch on the outside. A body of 50 armed men had been out, but no captures had been made. Hot work is anticipated. Major Fitzpatrick having distributed the goods to the Indians at Fort Laramie, would return soon.

The poor girl had no protector, and she avenged her own wrongs.

A Mr. Robinson, a man much respected and a justice of the peace, near Milford, Ohio, was killed last week in a singular manner. Mr. R., for some cause, was whipping his dog, when the animal turned upon him and caught him by the throat. While the dog held him in this position, his wife ran to the wood-pile and with the axe aimed a blow at the dog, but at the moment she struck they turned, and the blow fell upon the head of her husband, which killed him in a few minutes.

The Albany Atlas learns that on Saturday night, Oct. 1, some one placed two upright posts in a cattle guard on the N. Y. Central Railroad, between Amsterdam and Tribes Hill. The night express train came along at full speed and ran over the impediments with such velocity that the train was not thrown off the track. Feeling the shock, the engineer stopped the locomotive, and ascertained the case to be as above.

The Davenport (Iowa) Gazette, says: Our streets are crowded with the wagons, teams and cattle of movers, but that is nothing unusual, as there is a perfect stampede to the prairies of the West this fall. The papers all over the State speak of it as unprecedentedly large. At this rate, but few years can elapse before our "inland seas" will be fields of waving grain.

DIED,

In North Stonington, Ct., on the 20th of May, Capt. JEREMIAH YORK, in his 89th year. He was a Revolutionary pensioner, a man of strong mind, strict integrity, stern manners, yet gentlemanly, kind, and hospitable, especially to the poor and destitute. He some years since lost the use of his lower limbs, but retained his mental faculties almost unimpaired. He was peculiarly fond of discussion and debate, especially on the "script," as he used to express himself; his method was generally interrogatory and critical, which led many to suspect him of skepticism; yet he was a firm believer in the Bible, which was his daily companion. He never made a public profession of religion. On inquiry, just before his last illness, he said he was willing to go when it was God's will, and felt prepared for the event; and on another occasion, acknowledged that if he had done what he felt to have been his duty to have done in his youth, he would not then have been in doubt and darkness in his old age. He was grandfather to Mrs. Slafter, whose husband was one of the missionaries who fell a sacrifice to duty in heathen lands, (Siam,) and great-uncle to Mrs. Solomon Carpenter, missionary at Shanghae. P.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of TITSWORTHS & DUNN, have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 22 Dey-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 22 Dey-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

Miscellaneous.

The Ragged House.

From the London Athenæum.

The Rauhe Haus (Rough or Ragged House Establishment at Horn, near Hamburgh) differs in several points from most of the institutions devoted elsewhere to the recovery of vicious youth. The system now in use there, the result of some twenty years' progressive growth, is a remarkable specimen of organization, which must be studied in detail in order to be justly appreciated. Some of the principal features, however, will appear in a brief sketch of its rise and progress.

In 1832 there were in Hamburgh a few young men of slender means, associated for the purpose of relieving the wants and bettering the condition of the lowest poor. They found an appalling body of distress; but soon discovered that it was of a kind intractable even by resources far beyond theirs—inasmuch as the worst misery was here complicated with brutish ignorance and vice. Too many of the wretches whom they visited rejected all help that enjoined a change in their filty and criminal habits; the assistance given was instantly wasted, and sullen distrust or savage insolence defeated every attempt to amend permanently their way of life. The adults being thus hopeless, the only prospect of good which scanty means could effect seemed to lie in taking the young out of the reach of contagion before they were quite corrupted by it, and this led to the idea of removing a few of the worst to "a house of recovery."

The foremost of this little party, Herr Wichern, then a "candidate for the ministry," devoted himself to the project, and at once set about raising contributions for it. He collected something in this way; but would hardly have been able to make an effectual beginning, but for two happy circumstances. The first was a bequest of considerable amount for this very purpose, which had for some time been lying unemployed for want of an institution answering the testator's description, and which, after some trouble and demur, was obtained for Wichern's scheme. The second was the coöperation of a good and powerful man, Syndicus Sieveking, who not only furthered the plan by his subscriptions and influence, but also solved the main difficulty, of getting a site for the proposed colony of misdoers, by the gift of a piece of land at Horn—with a small dwelling upon it—known as the Rauhe Haus. This tenement Wichern entered in November, 1833, "then an unknown youth, with his mother, and the first three boys" (taken, of course, from the worst of the worst) all as one family.

This was the plan which he had formed to convert and raise to self-respect, through "family influence," by the operation of order and Christian love upon regular discipline and industry, a class of outcasts to whom these blessings were unknown. Their numbers were gradually increased as far as the size of the house allowed; the cultivation of the land, and some plain handiwork furnished the requisite employment. The fund with which Wichern started having been spent in stocking the farm and otherwise fitting up the establishment, its further support was derived from voluntary contributions; and so it has continued to exist and grow to its present dimensions—on casual provision. The institution is not self-supporting. The farm supplies some part of the sustenance of the household, and all the clothing is made by the pupils, but independently of the cost of continual extensions, it is plain that there is an annual deficit in the ordinary ways and means, which external charity is expected to make good.

The plan, from the first successful, was found to yield ever better results as experience and zeal suggested new improvements, and practice perfected the system. The attention of the benevolent was turned toward it, and supplied the means of its extension. This took place by successive additions of separate tenements, each of moderate size, so that the inmates of each might still be comprised within the "family" limit—that being one cardinal principle of the establishment. The number of these groups increasing, house after house was erected; and, before long, the new buildings could be raised by the hands of the boys themselves, under a few head-workmen. At present, the whole homestead is covered with such habitations, girls having, in process of time, been admitted, separate dwellings for these had to be provided; various schools, work-shops, a wash-house, laundry and kitchens, together with a small building for divine service, have been erected; and at last a commodious central or "mother house"—in which the principal, now married, with a family of his own, resides—the ruling spirit of a busy and prosperous institution, numbering more than 200 subjects. This institution is now known over Europe; and besides its direct benefits in returning to society as useful citizens, numbers who had been taken in as outcasts of the lowest kind, it has become a pattern for others in Germany, and, we believe, also in the United States; and has also become a central point for many other plans of benevolence tending to social reform.

It is still, as at first, a private establishment—authorized by the state, but in nowise bound to it. Nor is it formally a religious institution, although the basis of all its operations is Christian conversion. The inmates, so many as can, attend public worship in the adjacent parish church—all the devotional exercises within the institute itself are intended to bear the character of "family worship." Mere uniformity, whether in dress or in discipline, is carefully avoided, of course without prejudice to order. The declared object is, to awaken a sense of individual responsibility and consciousness of freedom; to raise the degraded and neglected by the influence of the household charities, and to correct a vicious bias by domestic vigilance and by cheerful labor—the latter relieved by due recreation. While the old monkish precept—Labora et ora—is enforced, the ascetic meaning of the rule is entirely avoided. Everything is done to make the house a place of joy and not of penance.

The system, by limiting the accumulation of numbers in any one group, obviously calls for an amount of co-habitation and oversight which the principal alone could no longer exercise after a second house had been added to the first. The necessary supplement was found in a special class of inmates, whom it is now time to mention. These are the "brethren" of the house—adults or youth of good character, who enter the house from pious motives, or with the design of training themselves for the practice of similar duties elsewhere. To each separate dwelling, or "family," a given number of these brethren is assigned—each of them taking in turn the duty of residence as heads of "the house," and assisting, when off that duty, in the general business of the institution or form, and in its external affairs. The resident lives with the boys, and stands towards them in loco parentis; their morals, comfort, and instruction within doors are under his charge. The groups, however, are not thus insulated in the daily work. From each house the boys proceed, as from a home, to their several occupations, determined by the age, capacity, or choice of each—one to the farm, another to the work-shop, another to the printing office. For now, among other developments of the Ragged House, it has its own press, serving the double purpose of supplying the demand for its reports and other special publications, and of furnishing instruction in various handicrafts useful as callings for the pupils when they return to the world. Thus, besides shoemaking, tailoring, carpentry, &c., bookbinding, type-founding, and composing are busily plied. In the first-named department, as well as in washing and cooking, the female subjects find ample employment. School hours are not neglected in this arrangement, a simple religious education being imparted to all whom the Ragged House receives, and, in some cases, a more learned instruction, where the pupil does not belong to the lowest class.

This last observation brings in another speciality of the Ragged House. The principal, maintaining throughout the liberty on which this whole method is based, does not confine admission to any single class. His doors, when able to receive new comers, are opened by preference to the most vicious and unpromising that he can find, in whatever rank; and although the lowest, of course, furnishes the most of these, it is by no means the only source. There are sad cases of obstinate wickedness—not falling within danger of the law—among the better classes; and of such not a few find their way to the Ragged House. For these, where parents or guardians have sufficient means, a payment is required in aid of the general fund. The finance of the institution is managed externally by committees of the subscribers; the internal distribution and control remaining with the President, assisted by a single colleague.

Wichern's success, on the whole, appears to have been great. As to 117 who had left the house up to 1846, either wholly educated in different trades and reformed, or sufficiently improved to be returned to their relations, the report gives the following table of their conduct afterward: Good, 73; middling, 18; bad, 13; imprisoned or examined by the Police, 6; career unknown, the parties having left Hamburgh, 7; total, 117. This surely exhibits a satisfactory per centage, when it is considered from what class the subjects have been purposely chosen.

A few remarks may now be added on matters of system and detail.

In the discipline of the house, confidence and the rejection of penal restraint—with due precautions against abuse, and under a regimen of order and labor—are carried out in a remarkable manner. The novice, whatever may have been his antecedents, is incorporated, as speedily as possible after admission, with one of the "family" groups. If he be perverse, mutinous, or unwilling to work, as he often is, the example and advice of his companion is relied on to tame his stubbornness nearly as much as the monition of his superior. No fear is shown of contamination from the fresh evil brought in by the new comer; nor is there any formal rule of non-intercourse. In extreme cases of brutal or blasphemous talk, a short period of absolute silence may be prescribed to the offender as a medicine; but this is seldom needed. The novice finds himself in another world; he is made to feel that his past will not be remembered against him—even the runaway, when caught and brought back, is received as if for the first time. Parents and relations, after due probation of the novice, are allowed free access to any inmate; but so as not to derange his appointed task, or to interference with his discipline. There is no restriction on the overseers as to their converse with the pupils, but in one important circumstance—the principal knows what their history has been before entering.

Under such general conditions, the good spirit of the place—its order, active work and cheerful play—kind control from above, and the influence of humanized comrades on every side—are found to change for the better in a short time, all but the most obdurate, shallow and bestial natures. The stupid and self-conceited types of sensual depravity appear to be the most unmanageable.

It is a striking circumstance that there is no express mention of any kind of punishment as a part of the Ragged House regimen. From an incidental notice in one place it would appear that "family discipline" does not exclude personal chastisement in certain extreme cases; but it seems that forcible coërcion is so rarely used, that it need not be specially numbered among the methods of treatment. Constant vigilance on the part of the "Brother" on duty, and a continual appeal, both directly and indirectly, to the better impulses of the pupil, fortified by the example of the well-conducted inmates—together with the constant use of religious exhortation—appear to be the standard means of preserving discipline and repressing crime; and it is averred that they are on the whole found to be amply sufficient. The application of such means to such objects, it is obvious, will be a task requiring the utmost discretion, patience, and experience—but these, it is said, have not hitherto been found wanting.

Among the active means of improvement, it is pleasing to find music taking a high place. Principal Wichern is an excellent musician, and good part-singing is heard through all the establishment—in devotion, as a school exercise, and as a favorite voluntary enjoyment in play hours. We read, that in some of the most hardened new comers the first sign of softening has been an effect of hearing the others sing; and that with all it is found one of the most helpful and humanizing of the various ancillary remedies, as well as an unfailing source of cheerfulness and delight. This truly welcome testimony to the virtue of the most engaging of the fine arts, might almost justify a more literal reading of the old Orphic mythus than is usually adopted by the learned.

The girls, it is stated, are generally more intractable than the boys. The hardest cases of all, we regret to find, are said to occur with subjects of the softer sex—when obstinacy and spite are covered with dissimulation. The most reprobate and stupid boy, it is observed, learns in time to understand where resistance is vain; and, this once understood, is not long in answering to kindness which he rejected at first. A girl of the worst kind, on the contrary, is tenacious in rebellion; and where its outward expression is restrained, is apt to assume a kind of fawning perversity, still more difficult to deal with.

Schoolday Reminiscences.

David Everett had a sprightliness of mind, with a liberal share of wit; rare poetic taste, as his poems show; and was a racy, pungent writer, admirrbly fitted for popular effect. Mr. Everett, in the winter previous to entering Dartmouth College, in 1791, when a teacher in the grammar-school at New Ipswich, prapared a little poem to be recited at an exhibition got up in the academic style, composed expressly for Ephraim H. Farrar, to be spoken by him on the occasion, when only seven years of age. We quote this curiosity, as it appears in Bingham's Columbian Orator. It is a rare sample of juvenile wit, and will be famous so long as a youthful orator appears on the floor of a school or an academy:—

"You'd scarce expect one of my age
To speak in public on the stage;
And if I chance to fall below
Demosthenes or Cicero,
Don't view me with a critic's eye,
But pass my imperfections by.
Large streams from little fountains flow;
Large oaks from little acorns grow;
And though I now am small and young,
Of judgment weak, and feeble tongue,
Yet all great learned men, like me
Once learned to read their A, B, C.
But why may not Columbia's soil
Bear men as great as Britain's isle—
Exceed what Greece and Rome done,
Or any land beneath the sun?
Mayn't Massachusetts boast as great
As any other sister State?
Or where's the town, go far and near,
That does not find a rival here?
Or where's the boy but three feet high
Who's made improvement more than I?
These thoughts inspire my youthful mind
To be the greatest of mankind—
Great, not like Cæsar, stained with blood,
But only great as I am good."

A Visit to Baron Von Humboldt.

A work by Prof. Benjamin Silliman, entitled "A Visit to Europe in 1851," has just been issued. It gives some interesting notices of European scholars, from which we select the following:—

BARON VON HUMBOLDT.

In fulfillment of an appointment, we went at one, and were admitted by his faithful servant, the companion of many an arduous journey. His mansion is a plain edifice, situated in a retired part of the city; and he would not have been now at home had not the king gone to Königsberg; for his residence is generally with the king, at Potsdam, who keeps him near his person, as his father did before him, not only for his society and conversation, but, no doubt, also as a counsellor, wise from his many years, and his large experience in the world. We passed through his library, which fills, on all sides, a room of considerable size; and he issued from a door on the remote side of the apartment, opening apparently from his private room. He met us with great kindness and perfect frankness, and with a pleasant rebuke for my having hesitated to call on him, (I had written a note, asking permission to call,) implying that he was not ignorant of my position and efforts at home. I then introduced my son, and Mr. Brush, and we were at once placed perfectly at our ease. His bright countenance expresses great benevolence; and from the fountain of his immense stores of knowledge, a stream, almost constant, flowed for nearly an hour. He was not engrossing, but yielded to our promptings, whenever we suggested an inquiry, or alluded to any particular topic; for we did not wish to occupy the time with our own remarks any further than to draw him out. He has a perfect command of the best English, and speaks the language quite agreeably. There is no stateliness or reserve about him; and he is as affable as if he had no claims to superiority. His voice is exceedingly musical, and he is so animated and amiable that you feel at once as if he were an old friend. His person is not much above the middle size; he is not unlike in form to the late Colonel Trumbull. He stoops a little, but less than most men at the age of 82. He has no appearance of decrepitude; his eyes are brilliant, his complexion light; his features and person are round, although not fat; his hair thin and white; his mind very active, and his language brilliant and sparkling with bright thoughts. He alluded in a flattering manner to our progress in knowledge in the United States, and to the effect which The American Journal of Science and Arts had produced in promoting it. He showed himself perfectly acquainted with the progress of physical science and general improvement in our country, and particularly commended the labors of Colonel Fremont in the Far West, of Professor Baché in the coast survey, and of Lieut. Maury in navigation. Bringing out his maps, and tracing his lines without glasses, he pointed out a channel of communication across the Isthmus of Darien, which he had observed and described more than forty years ago, and to which his attention had been recalled by a paper of Capt. Fitzroy's in The Journal of the Royal Geographical Society. He showed us that there are no mountains in the course he indicated, which is more southern than any of the existing routes, and that it possessed several important advantages. I alluded to his brief visit in the United States in 1804, when he traveled no further north than Philadelphia. He told us that he passed three weeks at Monticello with the late Mr. Jefferson, who entertained him with an extraordinary project of his inventive but often visionary mind, regarding the ultimate division of the American continent into three great Republics, involving the conquest of Mexico and of the South American States. He discussed many topics regarding the United States. The discovery of gold in California furnished him an abundant theme—our topography, climates, productions, institutions, and even political controversies, were all familiar to him.

Baron Humboldt, although associated intimately with kings, is evidently a friend to human liberty, and rejoices in the prosperity of our country. He made some very interesting remarks on the present state of Europe, and on the impossibility of keeping down moral power by physical force. In his library hung an excellent likeness of the King, and another of his own brother, the late William Humboldt, the eminent philologist and ethmological antiquary. We retired greatly gratified, and the the more so, as a man in his 83d year might soon pass away.

The Mocking Bird of America.

The American mocking bird is the prince of all song-birds, being altogether unrivaled in the extent and variety of his vocal powers; and, besides, the fullness and melody of his original notes, he has the faculty of imitating the notes of all other birds, from the humming bird to the eagle. Pennant states that he heard a caged one imitate the mewing of a cat, and the creaking of a sign in high winds. Barrington says his pipes come nearest to the nightingale of any bird he ever heard. The description, however, given by Wilson, in his own inimitable manner, as far exceeds Pennant and Barrington as the bird excels his fellow songsters. Wilson tells us that the ease, elegance, and rapidity of his movements, the animation of his eye, and the intelligence he displays in laying up lessons, mark the peculiarity of his genius. His voice is full, strong, and musical, and capable of almost every modulation, from the clear and mellow tones of the wood-thrush to the savage scream of the bald eagle. In measure and accents he faithfully follows his originals, while in strength and sweetness of expression he greatly improves upon them. In his native woods, upon a dewy morning, his song rises above every competitor, for the others appear merely as inferior accompaniments. His own notes are bold and full, and varied seemingly beyond all limits. They consist of short expressions of one, or at most five or six syllables, generally uttered with great emphasis and rapidity, and continued with undiminished ardor for half an hour, or for an hour at a time. While singing, he expands his tail, glistening with white, keeping time to his own music; and the buoyant gaiety of his action is no less fascinating than his song. He sweeps round with enthusiastic ecstacy; he mounts and descends, as his song swells or dies away; he bounds aloft with the celerity of an arrow, as if to recover or recall his very soul, expired in the last elevated strain. A by-stander might suppose that the whole feathered tribe had assembled together on a trial of skill—each striving to produce the utmost effect—so perfect are his imitations. He often deceives the sportsman, and even birds themselves are sometimes imposed upon by this admirable mimic. In confinement, he loses little of the power or energy of his song. He whistles for the dog; Cæsar starts up, wags his tail, and runs to meet his master. He cries like a hurt chicken, and the hen hurries about with feathers on end, to protect her injured brood. He repeats the tune taught him, though it be of considerable length, with perfect accuracy. He runs over the notes of the canary and red bird with such superior execution and effect, that the mortified songsters confess his triumph by their immediate silence. His fondness for variety, some suppose, injures his song. His imitation of the brown thrush is often interrupted by the crowing of cocks; and his exquisite warblings after the blue bird are mingled with the screaming of swallows or the cackling of hens. During moonlight, both in the wild and tame state, he sings the whole night long. The hunters, in their nocturnal excursions, know that the moon is rising, the instant they hear his delightful solo.

After Shakspeare, Barrington attributes, in part, the exquisiteness of the nightingale's song to the silence of the night; but, if so, what are we to think of the bird which, in the open glare of day, overpowers and often silences all competition? The natural notes of the American mocking bird are similar to those of the brown thrush. [Audubon.

Another White African.

The following account is given by E. C. Hood, M. D., of Whiteville, Harris Co., Ga. Charlotte is a woman thirty-four years old, and living within one mile of me, whose skin is as fair as that of any lady of Caucassian blood, and who was as black at the age of eleven as any African. She says her health has been uniformly good, with the exception of one 'spell of bowel complaint' which occurred when she was about ten years old; some time after which a white spot appeared on her forehead, which gradually though slowly enlarged. In the mean time other spots appeared on different parts of the face, which also increased in size, until the whole face became perfectly white. The change in the color of her face was completed in about six years, and she says that after her face 'turned white,' her whole body changed in one week. I saw her frequently during the metamorphosis, and noted its progress, during which time her countenance was so hideous that she was a fright to all the juveniles of the neighborhood.

She is at present strictly a white woman, except her eyes and hair, which are those of the negro—the latter, however being whitish all around the margin. The skin freckles and is easily blistered by the sun. She is a good servant, has ordinary intelligence, has had ten healthy children, all of whom are as black as their father, who is a full-blooded African.

The above are the facts of this 'strange freak of nature.' Was the change a pathological or a physiological one? I am inclined to the latter opinion, because the subject was in good health, and the skin seemed to be so during the change. But what strange whim possessed the absorbents to remove the pigmentum nigrum. [Med. and Surg. Jour.

Sharp Shooting.—A rifle-shooting match came off near Troy last week between a Mr. Williamson, of New York, and N. Lewis, of Troy. The match was for $400, offered by Williamson, the challenger, and won by Mr. Lewis. The distance 40 rods, each having 20 shots. Plain globe sights were used. Mr. Lewis' string, (reckoning the distance of each ball from the center,) measured 36 inches, and Mr. Williamson's 61. Mr. Lewis' shots averged only 1 and 1½ inches from the center point, and Mr. Williamson's 3 inches. Mr. Williamson was considered the best marksman in the State prior to shooting with Mr. Lewis. But few bets were made before the shooting commenced, but after Mr. Lewis' fourth shot, offers of five to one were made on him, but none taken. Mr. Lewis has won several "matches" within the last three years, amounting in all to over $1,000. Mr. Williamson used a rifle made in New Haven, Conn., and Mr. Lewis one of his own manufacture. Altogether, the shooting was considered the best ever done in these parts. Six hundred and sixty feet is a long shot.

If spring puts forth no blossoms, in summer there will be no beauty, and in autumn no fruit. So, if youth be trifled away without improvement, riper years will be contemptible, and old age miserable.

Preserving Herbs.

There are few persons who would not be occasionally benefitted by a cup of good herb tea. I do not mean such as is made from herbs dried in the sun, and boiled for half an hour in an old tin cup. Such a mess as that would make even a well person sick, who had ever known a better plan.

By attending to the following directions, all country people can have good herbs; and if they wish to give a city friend some acceptable trifle in return for their dinner when they go into the city shopping, let them roll up and carry a good bundle of various kinds of herbs, for in the city even a very small package costs a sixpence, and a large proportion of stems at that.

All kinds of herbs should be picked as soon as they begin to blossom, the dust rinsed off, the leaves and flowers stripped from the stems and spread on tins or clean paper, and exposed to a moderate artificial heat till perfectly dry and crisp, then put away in a clean, dry place. When required, make the tea just as you would green tea for table. Herbs are better dried in the shade than in the sun, but a moderate heat from the stove or oven is still better. [Rural New Yorker.

Improved Carriage Springs.—The editor of the Home Journal notices, among other ingenious inventions exhibited at the Crystal Palace, a newly invented carriage spring, which combines simplicity with lightness. It says:—

"Mr. Hubbard, a yankee, doubtless, abolishes all the old complexities, and simply rests the body of the carriage upon four straight sticks of elastic ash, which extend from axle to axle. The under part of the vehicle is rounded; and the thing is so managed that the springs cannot break, unless they are pulled asunder lengthwise. The advantages are, a saving of twenty-five dollars in expense, and fifty pounds in weight, besides a greatly increased luxury of motion. The simplicity of this improvement is another illustration of the old remark that the best way of doing things is always found out last. Mr. Hubbard tells with much humor, a story of a boy in Cleveland, who after examining one of the new carriages, turned away with the contemptuous remark, 'any fool might have thought of that'—precisely the effect which very happy inventions always produce upon the mind at first."

VARIETY.

The celebrated John Hunter is said to have made but one pun in his life, and that was when lecturing in the Windmill-street School of Medicine. In demonstrating the jaw-bone, he observed that the bone was known to abound in proportion to the want of brains. Some students at the time were talking instead of attending to the lecture, upon which Hunter exclaimed, "Gentlemen, let us have more intellect and less jaw."

Dr. Goldsmith having been requested by a wife to visit her husband, who was melancholy, called upon the patient, and, seeing that the case was poverty, told him he would send him some pills, which, he had no doubt, would prove efficacious. He immediately went home, put ten guineas in a pill-box, and sent them to the sick man. The remedy had its desired effect.

An old physician called Ingerhouz, who, when he was told that old Frederick of Prussia was dead, asked anxiously, "Are you very sure dat he is dead?" "Quite sure." "On what authority?" "Saw it in the papers." "You are very, very sure?" "Perfectly so." "Vell, now he is really dead, I vill say he vas de greatest tyrant dat ever existed."

Dr. Caspar, of Berlin, calculates that the mortality among bachelors, from the age of thirty to forty-five years, is twenty-seven per cent.; while among married men of the same age, it is only eighteen per cent. Out of a given number, forty-one bachelors only reach the age of forty years; seventy-eight married men reach that age.

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

But besides such inferential evidence of the observance of the Sabbath by the restored Israel, as implied in their reöbservance of the whole Law, its Millennial sanctification is matter of express prediction. Among other of the ordinances specified by Ezekiel, we read that "it shall be the Prince's part to give burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, and drink-offerings, in the Feasts, and in the new-moons, and in the Sabbath, in all solemnities of the house of Israel. He shall prepare the sin-offering, and the meat-offering, and the burnt-offering, and the peace-offerings, to make reconciliation for the house of Israel." Ezek. xlv. 17. Reference to their continued observance of the Sabbath, in connection with that of the new moons, is indeed made again and again: "Thus saith the Lord God, The gate of the inner court that looketh toward the east shall be shut the six working days; but on the Sabbath it shall be opened, and in the day of the new moon it shall be opened. And the Prince shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate without, and shall stand by the post of the gate, and the priests shall prepare his burnt-offering, and his peace-offerings, and he shall worship at the threshold of the gate; then he shall go forth, but the gate shall not be shut until the evening. Likewise the people of the land shall worship at the door of this gate, before the Lord, in the Sabbaths, and in the new moons." (xlvi. 1—3.) And, in the verses immediately following, the sacrifices are prescribed both for "the Sabbath day" and for "the day of the new moon." (Ver. 4—7.) And when the Prince prepares "a voluntary burnt-offering, or peace-offerings voluntarily unto the Lord," it is to be "as he did on the Sabbath day." (xlvi. 12.)

It cannot be necessary that we should insist that "the Sabbath" in such texts is the Seventh Day of the week—the day sanctified and blessed from the beginning of the world. Nor should it be necessary to repeat, that no other day is ever spoken of, in either the Old Testament or the New, as the weekly Sabbath. But that it is the same Sabbath which the Israelites were of old commanded to "remember" that is thus spoken of, is farther evident by the complaints of Israel's previous Sabbath profanation, and the divine acknowledgment of their fidelity in its true observance in Millennial times. Remonstrating with them by the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel, on account of the sad moral and spiritual condition of His people, God speaks thus of the aggravation of their transgression: "Moreover, this they have done unto me; they have defiled my sanctuary in the same day, and have profaned my Sabbaths." Ezek. xxiii. 38. And in the preceding chapter, among other evils specified, He says, "Thou hast despised mine holy things and hast profaned my Sabbaths." Ezek. xxii. 8. And in a subsequent part of the same chapter we read: "And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Son of man, say unto her, Thou art the land that is not cleansed, nor rained upon in the day of indignation. There is a conspiracy of her prophets in the midst thereof, like a roaring lion ravening the prey; they have devoured souls; they have taken the treasure and precious things; they have made her many widows in the midst thereof. Her priests have violated my law, and have profaned mine holy things; they have put no difference between the holy and profane, neither have they showed difference between the unclean and the clean, and have hid their eyes from my Sabbaths, and I am profaned among them." Ver. 23—26. But the contrast to this their evil condition is also furnished in the portraiture of their future fidelity, furnished by the prophet, when, in the same series of predictions to which we have already referred, he gives it as one of the characteristics of Israel's restored and converted state, that their honored and acknowledged priesthood shall then do what had all along been required of them, but which previously they had neglected to do. Now, says Jehovah, "they shall teach my people the difference between the holy and profane, and cause them to discern between the unclean and the clean. And in controversy they shall stand in judgment; and they shall judge it according to my judgments; and they shall keep my laws and my statutes in all mine assemblies; and they shall hallow my Sabbaths." Ezek. xliv. 23, 24. Here, then, is the complete rectification of the evils previously denounced. The specification of sins in the one case is perfectly parallel with the contrasted list of performed duties in the other. In each particular, the correspondence is obvious; and, therefore, that as the Sabbath, the profanation of which God so deplored, was unquestionably the Seventh Day, so also must it be the Seventh Day which God so pleasingly acknowledges they now "shall hallow."

These "priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok," themselves faithful, and taught of God, will teach His people the import and importance of the divine statutes—having the holy Law for their guidance. And it is worthy of observation, that while, by the prophet, God foretells the return of His people to their allegiance, and of these His priests as teaching generally and entirely His statutes and judgments, that it is yet added specifically, "They shall hallow my Sabbaths." And while the ordinances of the Sabbath, as distinguished from other days, are expressly appointed—their sacrifices differing again, as under the Levitical institutions of old—so also is it to be observed, that the weekly Sabbath is distinguished unmistakably from all other sabbatical festivals appointed for Israel. Not only, indeed, does it here, again and again, receive its definite and peculiar title of "the Sabbath day"—a title which the first day of the week never receives in either the Old Testament or the New—but it is also put in express contradistinction to "the six working days," (Ezek. xlvi. 1, 4,) while the fact that there are still "six working days" necessarily excludes the first day from participation in the sacredness of the Sabbath, and thus exposes the error of those early Christians, and a refutation of the conceit continued in the Ecclesiastical constitutions, which authoritatively consecrated both Sabbath and Sunday to sacred uses. There is still "the Sabbath day," and still also, "the six working days." And as the period pointed to is that of "THE RESTITUTION of all things," of which the prophets speak, we are fairly entitled to conclude, that none of the prophets can have spoken of the first day of the week as intended by God to take the place of the Sabbath—otherwise it would have been restored to that place. The prophets have nowhere spoken of such alleged change. Frequent reference is made by them to the Sabbath of the Lord. Its character and purpose are exhibited; its neglect is bewailed; its desecration is denounced; its faithful observance by His people hereafter, is foretold; and blessing is promised to all who call it a delight, holy unto the Lord, and honorable. But as the word of God contains no intimation, direct or indirect, of any change of the day, meditated or desired by the Lord, so neither do we find any such change included among the things restored in the long-desired day. But conspicuous among the things to be taught by the faithful sons of Zadok, and restored in the affections and practical observance of God's people, is their sanctification of His holy and blessed Sabbath. Long has creation groaned under the burden of corruption, and the value of the Sabbath as the appointed memorial of God's creative power, wisdom, and goodness, has not been appreciated as it ought; but when all things are restored, the Sabbath, suggestive and significant of His rest after He had looked upon the works of His hand and pronounced them all to be "very good," shall fully serve its proper purpose. Creation shall have now received its Maker, resident in the earth, as its acknowledged King—for by Him who is the image of the invisible God "were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible,"—the curse which rebellion brought shall be removed, the earth everywhere abundantly bringing forth its fruits, and Israel especially receiving at the Lord's hand better than at their beginnings—in grateful memorial of Him who made and who redeemed them, Israel, God himself declares, "shall hallow my Sabbaths."

A DISFIGURED SOUL.

Gold well gotten is bright and fair; but there is gold which rusts and cankers. The stores of the man who walks according to the will of God are under a special blessing, but the stores which have been unjustly gathered are accursed. "Your gold and your silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat up your flesh as fire." Far better have no gold at all than gold with that curse on it. Far better let cold pinch this frame, or hunger gnaw it, than that the rust of ill-gotten gold should eat it up as fire.

Perhaps you may once or twice in your life have passed a person whose countenance struck you with a painful amazement. It was the face of a man with features as of flesh and blood, but all hue of flesh and blood was gone, and the whole visage was overspread with a dull silver-gray and mysterious metallic gloss. You felt wonder, you felt curiosity, but a deep impression of the unnatural made pain the strongest feeling of all which the spectacle excited. You found it was a poor man who, in disease, had taken mercury till it transfused itself through his skin and glistened in his face. Now, go where he will, he exhibits the proof of his disorder, and of the large quantity of metal he has consumed. If you had an eye to see the souls that are about you, many would you see—alas, too many—who are just like that; they have swallowed doses of metal—ill-gotten, cankered, rusted metal—till all purity and beauty are destroyed. The metal is in them, throughout them, turning their complexion, attesting their disorder, rendering them shocking to look upon for all eyes that can see souls. If you have unjust gains, they do not disfigure the countenance on which we, short-sighted creatures look; but they do make your soul a pitiful sight to the great open Eye that does see. Of all poisons and plagues, the deadliest you can admit to your heart is gain which fraud was won. The curse of the Judge is in it; the curse of the Judge will never leave it; it is woe, and withering, and death to you; it will eat you; it will eat you up as fire; it will witness against you—ay, were that poor soul of yours, at this precise moment, to pass into the presence of its Judge, the proof of its money-worship would be as clear on its visage as the proof that the man we have described has taken mercury is plain upon his.

At a church on Sunday morning, the clergyman who supplied the pulpit, in the absence of the regular pastor, rather surprised the congregation by stopping in the midst of his discourse, and remarking, that "he was so constituted that it was unpleasant for him to observe any one reading while the services were going on."

GIVE! GIVE!

BY REV. J. SMITH, CHELTENHAM, ENGLAND.

"The sun gives ever; so the earth—
What it can give, so much his worth,
The ocean gives in many ways—
Gives paths, gives fishes, rivers, bays;
So, too, the air, it gives us breath—
When it stops giving, in comes death.
Give, give, be always giving;
Who gives not is not living.
The more we give,
The more we live.

"God's love hath in us wealth upheap'd,
Only by giving is it reap'd.
The body withers, and the mind,
If pent in by a selfish rind.
Give strength, give thought, give deeds, give pelf,
Give love, give tears, and give thyself.
Give, give, be always giving;
Who gives not is not living.
The more we give,
The more we live."

CALIFORNIA—MORALS, MINING, &C.

The following letter from our friend Paul Stillman, bearing date of Downieville, California, Sept. 10, 1853, gives much valuable information, and will no doubt prove exceedingly interesting to many of our readers.

Downieville, the place where I have been located for the past two months, is in latitude 39 deg., 33 min., 16 sec., and in west longitude 120 deg., 39 min., 8 sec., 34½ west from the eastern line of the State. It is at the junction of the North and South Forks of the North Yuba, is the county seat of Sierra Co., and is estimated to be 5000 feet above tide water, and is surrounded by hills 3000 to 4000 feet high, on some of which snow still exists. It is approached only by mule trails, though there is a wagon or two here, that were brought down the hill by hitching a good-sized pine tree, top foremost, to them from behind, and a pair of good mules ahead. It must have been a difficult task even then, except at one place on the south, where a good road has been laid out, and in part worked. But even it is too steep for a man, with good health and a conscience to ride on horseback, and it takes one and a half hours to gain the summit. You would then be on the divide between the North and Middle Yubas, and on one of the best of the wagon roads from the plains, by the Truckee route, into this part of the State, and about 60 miles from Marysville. The climate has beauties. It is day by day the same for some four to six months. I cannot give you the temperature, for I had the ill luck to break my thermometer at sea, and there is but one in the village, of which I can only hear, that it is in the printing office. I judge, however, that at midday it is at from 80 degs. to 90 degs., and at daylight at about 50 degs. There is a fine breeze up the river from 10 or 12 o'clock A. M. to 2 or 4 o'clock P. M., which moderates the heat; and the absence of the wind makes the cold less searching, to say the least. From the 26th ult. to the 3d inst., the sky was much clouded, accompanied with varying winds; on the night of both days there was heavy thunder, and on the first a slight sprinkle, and the last a fine shower. It is said that similar weather occurs at the same season every year. It has since been exceedingly clear and beautiful weather, and will probably continue so for two months to come, at which time the rains begin to set in, and the tops of the hills begin to be mantled with snow.

The population of Downieville is from 600 to 800, and, including the miners within ten miles, not less than 5,000. Of ladies there are some twenty, and of other females, not ladies, about an equal number. There is no trading station higher on the Yuba, and consequently it has much trade in miners' supplies, which are abundant, and said to be cheap. I will, for illustration, give you a sample of my grocer's bill, every dry substance being by the pound: Flour 16c, ham 33c, butter 63c, cheese 50c, sugar 30c, beans 20c, salt 20c, rice 14c, potatoes 8c, onions 30c, crackers 30 to 40c, corn meal 26c, molasses $3 00 per gal., vinegar $2 50, milk $2 00, fresh beef, 25 to 30c, mutton 50c, garden vegetables, including melons, &c., about 13c, preserved meats, fruits, &c., in quart cans, $18 to $24 per doz. Liquors and cigars are very plenty, and I should judge very cheap. There are some five or six large public houses or Hotels, and as many more boarding houses. Board from $12 to $16 per week, horse keeping $3 per day. Hay 12½c. per lb. by the bale, barley $8 per 100 lbs. There are four blacksmiths' shops, where miners' picks, bars, and other tools, are made and repaired, two tin manufacturers, one cabinet maker, one shoe maker or cobbler, one watch maker, and two saw-mills. Of doctors and lawyers I can not give you the number; nor of gamblers, (regular or professional,) for almost every body gambles a little, so far as to buy a ticket in a raffle now and then, at least; but there are several large saloons where there are several tables each, at which you might nightly see hundreds amusing themselves by paying over their hard earnings for the fun of handling or seeing others handle the cards. There was a school, but I have heard that "it did not go now;" and there was once an attempt at a church, but it was never finished, the building being merely enclosed, but without windows or slips. There is a Methodist minister—a missionary—here, who attempted to gather a congregation, but so far has failed to do so. Whether he had any of his covenant brethren here for a nucleus, or not, I have not learned. A few weeks ago he published a Card, stating his reasons for coming here, and saying how much he had with him, and how much he had since received, and his present destitution, which, he stated, left him not enough to enable him to leave the place; whereupon, it is said, the gamblers promptly made him up a purse, which they thought would be sufficient to enable him to travel so far that he would not be compelled to call upon them again; but I see he is still here, and learn that he has taken the street for his field, and made a large increase in his congregation of—hearers. Sunday is the business day in Downieville, as in all other mining places in this State. They do not work the mines, but they come to town and buy their supplies, get their tools put in order, exchange interests in claims, gamble, get on a bender, and in fact have what they regard doubtless as a glorious time. I send you a bill of an entertainment for next Sunday at our first neighbor's on the north, Gibsonville, which you will please accept as a part of this letter. I hope that none of my friends will think, from this condition of Sunday-keeping, that this State is an inviting field for Sabbath-keepers to enter as mission ground. I will assure you, that it is not for salvation that men come to this country, and if I were allowed to judge in such a matter by men's conduct, I should think that very many of those here came for the sake of quietly avoiding it.

The region about Downieville has been one of the richest in gold deposits in the State. The site of the village was once a small lake, or perhaps only a level place in the river, occasioned by a barrier of strong or hard rock, which crossed the course of the river just below the fork, by which means the gold that had been washed from the surrounding hills was checked here in its course. This barrier broke away by degrees, which caused the river to deepen its channel, and by so doing left flats, where the gold had been deposited, and where it became deeply covered by the washing down of the hills. My first visit to the place was in company with one of the "49ers," who, like the locusts of Egypt, so quickly overran this whole mountain range. He with his party prospected this place in 1849, and actually pitched their tent on the flat where the village now stands, but saw nothing to invite their shovel and pick, and so passed over the millions of dollars that lay here waiting their toil.

Though much has been said by correspondents of gold digging, I suppose little is really understood at home of the gold miner's labors, or of the locality of the gold dust, or lumps, as it may be. I know not whether it will pay the trouble of communicating; but it will serve to finish out the picture of my present sojourn, and I will venture to take your time, or mine at least, to communicate.

It is to be known, then, in the first place, that the whole region was once a level country, or at least that it was comparatively so, and was traversed by large rivers, perhaps by the Sacramento, or one running nearly across the beds of the present small streams, and probably one thousand feet above the present stream. The bed of such a stream, forming one of the best class of gold diggings in the State, runs through the present hills, and is cut across by the Feather River, and all of the branches of the Yuba. Whether it has been subject to an upheaval, or whether this elevation of seven or eight thousand feet was original with the present organization of the earth's crust, it is impossible to conjecture, with any show of plausibility; at any rate, there was a slope of that height towards the great valley or swamp of the Sacramento, and down that slope the mountain torrents found their way, and the soil is of a nature to wash away easy, when once well soaked. It has been obstructed by little formidable or strong rock, and it has cut down rapidly, probably at first forming cascades or falls, as in almost all such circumstances are liable to do; and as it would rapidly recede in such a soil, it would form a deep gulch, into which the banks would cave, and the soil be washed away, and the stone broken and ground up. A subsequent series of falls would be formed, acting upon the harder rock and slate, which in many cases fell off to the side of the original, leaving it high up the bank of the river. These second falls, or series of falls, like the first, formed like gulches or chasms, into which more extensive slides and caving in and washing occurred. The last have worn deeply into the bed rock; the former, but little. It is thus that the gold, which was very sparsely scattered over the country, has been gathered together in the bottoms of these river beds, which are now from one to three thousand feet deep, and from one to two miles wide at the top, and including the tributaries, greater and less, probably averaging from ten to twenty miles. At the bottom it is only the width of the stream, with an occasional flat.

The art of the miner is to receive or gather the gold that has been thus placed in the bed of the river, and in almost all cases on the bed rock. When it occurs in the old beds, it is by washing off the top soil and removing the stones with the pick and shovel; and this forms the class of diggings called bank digging or slicsing. If the top soil does not contain gold in appreciable quantities, and particularly if there is much of it above the bed rock, the gold is got out by what is called tunneling or drifting. An entrance is made in the bank a little lower than the supposed or ascertained place of the bed rock, into which the miner works his way, in most cases shoreing up the top soil or stones, and in some cases fairly roofing and siding up the passage. In others the stones are so compacted as to require neither. When they have worked a passage of 50 to 500 feet, and they strike a fortunate locality, they may find $100 to $200 per day, but seldom over one to two ounces to each hand, for a few months; perhaps as often nothing at all. But to get the gold, all of the stones, gravel and earth taken from a given distance from the bed rock, are to be washed. That is no easy task, unless water is plenty, which is generally not the case on a sidehill. To obtain this, they provide a spirit level, and starting from their mining ground, they extend the level up stream, and around streams, until they find water of such height that they can lead it to the mine. Then they return and dig a ditch or build a flume, or conjointly, as best answers their end, up to where the level strikes the stream. A dam is then thrown across, and so much of the water directed from its channel as will answer their demand. Such ditches or canals are now being extended all over the mining region in the State, some of them extending over a range of ten, twenty, and even fifty miles, crossing valleys above 100 feet from the ground, and supplying nearly or quite as much water as the Croton Aqueduct of New York. The water being on the ground, a certain quantity is taken, say two inches deep, into a sluice box or range of troughs about 1 foot wide and from 50 to 200 feet long, and having a descent something like of 1 foot in 15 or 20. Into this whatever is to be washed is thrown, and is borne by the current downward, the stones rolling and tumbling, and the soil mixing with the water and floating off to the end, whence it falls into the abyss below, or is again caught to answer the end of some one on a lower level. A casual observer would think that all was gone; but not so. These sluice boxes are provided with what are called riffles, or nitches in the bottom, where the gold falls, and is kept out of the current. Some of these are a simple grating across the box; others are perforated iron plate; but both in sufficient quantity to take up all of the gold. These riffles are all to be cleaned out daily, and the gold, earth, stones, &c., carefully washed out in a pan by an experienced man, and whatever gold is found is dried and again subjected to the further operation of blowing out the black iron sand always found with it.

The method pursued with the soil, stones, &c., found in the river beds, is the same, excepting that a tom is very generally substituted for the riffles. The tom is a box some ten feet wide, and eight or ten long, the lower end provided with a perforated iron plate, which is curved up so as to form an end of such height that nothing shall be carried over it. Into this the same quantity of water as in the sluices is introduced, and the dirt is thrown in in larger quantity, as from a wheel-barrow or bucket, and a man is stationed at the tom to agitate the matter with a shovel until the soil is all washed away, when the stones are all shoveled into a heap or into the stream. A shallow box, with still shallower partitions crosswise, is placed beneath this perforated iron plate, into which all the fine gravel, gold dust, &c., falls—the heavier particles going to the bottom, while those of less gravity are borne away by the constant flow of water. But the tom is not confined to the river mines, nor the sluice boxes to the banks and drifts; each is used as circumstances control.

But the principal difference in the two kinds of operation is in the method of getting the dirt to wash. It is of no use to go and get the soil from the bottom of the streams. It must be taken from within one foot of the bed rock, and this is from three to twenty feet below the bed of the stream, and covered with immense boulders and lesser stones and gravel, and often cemented with iron oxide. To get down to it, the river is to be taken out of its bed. It cannot be dammed and turned aside, as in a level country, but it is to be flumed, which is done by laying sleepers made of trees or logs upon the stones, or building up piers of stone or of other logs for them, and cross-ties upon them, upon which they build a box or spout sufficiently large to contain or conduct the water of the river. A dam is then thrown across the stream at the head, and another at the foot, and the job is done. It may appear to be an easy operation, but when it has to be done, it appears quite the reverse. This frame work has to be laid in such a manner that it will sustain the whole weight of the water, and at the same time it has to be done with a view to its removal piece by piece, as they remove the soil below, and it has to be done in water at 50° temperature, often working in water up to the waist, with a stream rushing and roaring over its rocky bed, and with a burning sun on your head;—and it is to be done in a hurry. It cannot be begun until the river is nearly at low water mark, and you must have scraped and chiseled off the whole surface of the bed work, and removed every stone and all of the gravel, and much of it twice. Add to this, there are springs, leakage of dam and of the flume, to be provided for. This requires pumping apparatus to be provided. Then there is water to be made available for washing the dirt, and sluicing boxes or toms to be erected; there are derricks for removing the heavy stones to be rigged up; and then comes the constant break downs, arising from bad workmanship, haste, poor material, and perhaps worse engineering; then the constant illness of some imprudent man—and it is a wonder that they are not all sick—and you may gather some idea of working the river beds. And for all of this you may never get the gold that would pay the whiskey bill of any of the company—while others make a pile speedily.

A panorama of the Yuba for ten miles, showing fairly all of the mining operations, with the flumes, water wheels, connected with pumps, and the contrivances for working them, would make a most inviting show to such as wish to know the modus operandi of getting gold. I think there are not less than 200 water wheels in that distance; and then the countless drifts into the sides of the hill, exploring for old beds, and the shafts sunk in the ground for the same purpose, often suggesting the idea of pigeon coops on a farmer's barn, from their number and their order. There is not within a circuit of five miles a foot of ground where human conjecture can locate a "pocket," but what a shaft has been sunk, or a drift run. Whole acres of ground stand on posts; and yet they say they have not begun to exhaust the gold from the place.

EXCUSES FOR NOT GOING TO CHURCH.—There is no excuse so trivial, that will not pass, upon some men's consciences, to excuse their attendance at the public worship of God. Some are so unfortunate as to be always indisposed on the Lord's day, and think nothing so unwholesome as the air of the church. Others have their affairs so oddly contrived, as to be always unluckily prevented by business. With some it is a great mark of wit, and deep understanding, to stay at home on Sabbath. Others again discover strange fits of laziness, which seize them particularly on that day, that confine them to their beds. Others are absent out of mere contempt for religion. And, lastly, there are not a few who look upon it as a day of rest, therefore claim the privilege of their castle, to keep the Sabbath by eating, drinking, and sleeping, after the toil and labor of the week. Now, in all this, the worst circumstance is, that these persons are such whose companies are most required, and who stand most in need of a physician. [Dean Swift.

DODDRIDGE'S MOTHER.

The incident related of Dr. Doddridge's early history, referring to the manner in which his mother imparted instruction to him when a child, is well told in the following passage. We copy from the Sermon of Prof. Phelps, on "The Certainty of Success in Preaching," delivered before the Congregational Pastoral Association, and published in the Bibliotheca Sacra:—

About one hundred and fifty years ago, there lived in a stifled street in London, a tradesman and his wife, who watched with many misgivings the slender form and pale cheek of a little boy, their only son, and, with one exception, the only survivor of twenty children. The utmost they dared to hope for, as the result of parental faithfulness, was, that "poor little Philip" might, by the grace of God, be prepared for an early death. For this they labored and prayed and wept together. The chimney of the family-room, where they usually sat after their evening meal, was ornamented, according to a fashion which had been imported from Holland, with a series of painted tiles. On those tiles were pictured, with rude taste, scenes and events recorded in the Scriptures. There, "in deep blue on a ground of glistering white," were Adam and Eve and the serpent. Next in order were Elisha's bears devouring the irreverent children. Then followed Joseph in the pit into which his brethren cast him. And here, at the end of the series, we may suppose, stood the stern men who frowned on the little children as they came to Christ. Those pictured tiles were to "poor little Philip's" unlettered mother, more precious than the gold of Ophir. They were her pictorial Bible. In her homely way, she expounded them to her son as he was seated by her side in the old arm-chair. She poured into his curious ear her rude but truthful conceptions of man's lost condition, of God's wonderful providence, and of His more wonderful grace. She found a willing pupil. God's truth, extracted by maternal diligence from that painted wall, sunk deep into the pale boy's heart. His delicate sensibilities grew around it and became rooted in its embrace. The distinguishing feature of his youtful piety was a love of the Bible. It grew with his growth and strengthened with his strength. It fashioned itself in the depths of his soul into the germ of a hidden purpose, which the providence of God at length developed. Thirty years afterwards, when the Rev. Dr. Philip Doddridge was engaged in the work of composing the 'Family Expositor,' he traced back the impulse, which by the grace of God had moved him to that work, to those old Dutch tiles which had been the text-book of his early lessons in his mother's arm-chair. It was the remembrance of them, which quickened and sustained his zeal in the protracted labor of that which he considered his life's work. That remembrance it was, which lighted up his study-lamp for his labors upon the Family Expositor, at four o'clock of the winter mornings, through a period of twenty years. That it was, which forbade him to turn aside from the exposition of the Bible for any inferior service. Only in obedience to the earnest and oft-repeated solicitations of his friend, Dr. Isaac Watts, did he consent to the digression of composing the Rise and Progress. And when at last he lay down to die, in a strange land, it was his strong consolation, that he had been permitted to see three volumes of the Expositor given to the world. Since that time, a hundred years have come and gone, but the work of Doddridge lives. Considered as one of the earliest and most successful of popular English commentaries on the Bible, and as a link in the chain of causes which have created a biblical literature for the people, it is destined to live forever. The earthquake of Lisbon, which occurred soon after his death, rocked the ground where his bones reposed. It was a fit emblem of the commotion with which every benighted land shall one day be roused by the dissemination of the sacred Scriptures.

MAY YOU DIE AMONG YOUR KINDRED.

It is a sad thing to feel that you must die away from your home. Tell not the invalid, who is yearning after his distant country, that the atmosphere around him is soft; that the gales are filled with balm, and the flowers are springing from the green earth; he knows that the softest air to his heart would be the air that hangs over his native land; that more grateful than all the gales of the south would breathe the low whispers of anxious affection; that the very icicles clinging to his own eaves, and the snow beating against his own windows, would be far more pleasant to his eyes than the bloom and verdure which only more forcibly remind him how far he is from that one spot which is dearer to him than all the world beside. He may, indeed, find inestimable friends, who will do all in their power to promote his comfort and assuage his pains; but they cannot read, as in a book, the mute language of his face; they have not learned to wait upon his habits, and anticipate his wants, and he has not learned to communicate, without hesitation, all his wishes, impressions, and thoughts, to them. He feels that he is a stranger; and a more desolate feeling than that could not visit his soul. How much is expressed by that form of Oriental benediction, "May you die among your kindred."

THE MISSIONARY.—There is no employment more honorable, more worthy to take up a great spirit, more requiring a generous and free nature, than to be the messenger and herald of heavenly truth from God to man; and, by the faithful word of holy doctrine, to procreate a number of faithful men, making a kind of creation like to God's, by infusing his Spirit and likeness into them, to their salvation, as God did unto him; arising to what climate soever he turn him, like that SUN of righteousness that sent him, with healing on his wings, and new light to break in upon the chill and gloomy hearts of his hearers, raising out of darksome barrenness a delicious and fragrant spring of saving knowledge and good works. The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, October 20, 1853.

ANNIVERSARY AFTERTHOUGHTS.

Our last Anniversaries have suggested a few thoughts, of which we cannot, probably, make a better disposition than to give them to the readers of the Recorder.

1. It is desirable that our missionary labors be prosecuted more efficiently. China will soon be open throughout its length and breadth. The missionary field will no longer be confined to a few seaports on the coast, but will embrace its four thousand walled cities, and its three millions of inhabitants. From all the interior provinces, and from all her back settlements, will come up the Macedonian cry; and if it be not sounded in louder tones to Seventh-day Baptists than to any other class of people, we are much mistaken. Yet Seventh-day Baptists, we fear, will not be ready for it. They have not the men to send as missionaries to that great country. They are not prepared to occupy the important stations that will claim their attention, and others will seize upon them. Is not the thought humiliating?

2. It is important that some efficient measures be adopted to encourage those whom God may have called to the work of the ministry. More ministers we must have, or else the denomination must run down. Something like one fifth of the whole number of our churches is destitute of pastoral care. Most, if not all, of these destitute churches present very important fields of labor. Yet we see no prospect of their being soon supplied. How long must this state of things continue? We ask the question, not because we suppose that churches can create ministerial gifts at pleasure, but because we think it not unlikely that there has been a failure to seek out, and properly encourage, such young men as God may have filled with a desire for the work. Choice plants are cultivated in gardens and hot-houses; we do not expect to see them growing in fallow ground. And it would be a marvelous thing, if young ministers should spring up, and become matured, in churches where the fallow has not been broken for years. It is only in a mellow and well cultivated soil that young prophets can thrive. And we are most solemnly impressed with the fact, that the soil of most of our churches is not adapted to the growth of those who might, under favorable circumstances, be brought out as efficient laborers for God. We want more piety—more whole-hearted consecration to God—more of the spirit of prayer—more earnestness for the cause of truth.

3. We need (if we could have it) a good Theological School. We are not so particularly impressed, as some are, with the danger of sending our young men to the schools of other denominations; on the contrary, we think it has a liberalizing and elevating effect to have them brought into contact with the good of all persuasions. Still we think it quite desirable to have an institution of our own. The experience of all denominations is in favor of such institutions. Hamilton and Newton have done great things for the Baptists; Princeton for the Presbyterians. Why could not Seventh-day Baptists be benefited in like manner. It is true, that some want of uniformity obtains among us in regard to our doctrinal views, owing in part to the different sources whence we have been brought together; but, if we mistake not, a good theological school would go far to correct this evil. Many years would not elapse, before we could send out from such a school a ministry, which would do more to consolidate and systematize our theological principles than any other case which could be brought into requisition. Let us have such a school. At all events, let us have a beginning towards it. Let something be done with the least possible delay, that shall have an eye towards such an establishment, and that shall continue to keep the thing in view till it stands before us a thing accomplished.

4. We need a good denominational building in the city of New York. We presume that the day is long since past, that elicited doubts whether this was the place for issuing our publications, and carrying on the operations of our different societies. Nobody doubts it now. Yet we have no suitable building for these purposes. We have no room where our Missionary Board can get together for its deliberations; we are dependent upon a private parlor. If a stranger wishes to inquire about our missionary operations, he knows not where to go. The Corresponding Secretary lives in Williamsburgh, and the Mission Rooms are—nowhere! The Tract Depository and Publishing Society's office are crowded together in a hired apartment, back room, third story, and by no means an inviting place for strangers to visit. We want a different state of things—we want it at once, we cannot afford to wait. There is wealth enough in the denomination to build the desired edifice, and we do believe that, if the denomination lives and maintains respectability, it will be done without much farther delay.

These are a few of our thoughts. We might add others, but as short articles are more likely to be read than long ones, we forbear for the present. T. B. B.

METHODIST TRACT BOARD.—The Managers of the Tract Society of the M. E. Church held their quarterly session at the Mission Rooms, in this City, on the 12th inst. The Treasurer, J. B. Edwards, Esq., reported the receipts of the Society, thus far, to be $5,034. The Corresponding Secretary, Rev. A. Stevens, reported that 30 Conferences have adopted the cause; 12 Conference Agents have been appointed; 45 Colporteurs have been sent out; and $19,000 have been subscribed at the Conferences. The revision of the entire series of the Society's tracts has has been completed, and many substitutions and additions made. The list now includes 440. The volume series includes 50 works, large and small.

ANNIVERSARY FRAGMENTS.

In our hasty sketch, last week, of proceedings at Adams, we were compelled to omit two or three things of which some notice ought to be taken.

On the afternoon of First-day, Oct. 9, the Committee appointed by the General Conference "to take such measures as they may deem proper in regard to our educational interests," called a public meeting for consultation. After a full explanation of the objects of the meeting, the position of our educational affairs, and the wishes of the Committee, the following resolution was introduced, made the subject of remark by several persons, and unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, That the interests of Literary and Theological Education in the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination make it advisable to revive the Education Society formed at Alfred in 1849, under such alterations of the Constitution there adopted, as the Educational Committee of the General Conference, and the Board of said Society, shall deem necessary.

Wm. C. Kenyon then introduced the following resolution, which he advocated in an interesting address, and which was adopted after remarks by several other brethren, among whom were L. Crandall, T. B. Brown, J. Bailey, Geo. B. Utter, J. Greene, and L. Andrus:—

Resolved, That the time has come when immediate measures should be taken to establish a Seventh-day Baptist Theological Seminary.

The following resolutions were also remarked upon by various members of the congregation, and adopted, viz:—

Resolved, That it be recommended to the Conference Committee to investigate, and report to the denomination, or to the Conference at its next session, upon the best location for a Literary and Theological Institution, and the plan by which such an institution may be established.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the Board of the Education Society to take measures to collect funds and appropriate the same at their discretion, to aid young men who are preparing for the Gospel ministry.

Resolved, That the Educational Committee be recommended to take such steps as they may deem expedient for the establishment of a Theological Library.

Pending the last resolution, Thomas B. Stillman stated that he had recently been informed that a valuable library of a deceased Baptist clergyman in England, containing some 2000 volumes, (which were selected mainly by Dr. Joseph Stennett,) was soon to be sold at auction under a government order, unless previously disposed of at private sale, and that it could now be bought for about $1000. It was finally resolved to open a subscription on the spot for the purchase of this library, and in half an hour over $900 was subscribed for the object.

The exercises of this afternoon, as a whole, were deeply interesting, and did much, we doubt not, to advance the cause of education among us.

The evening following First-day was devoted to a Missionary Conference. This meeting we were unable to attend, and we have failed to receive, as we had hoped, an account of it from one who was present. We can only say, therefore, that it was participated in by a large number of persons, and was represented to us as a very fitting close of the anniversary season.

OUR LATE ANNIVERSARIES.

Sometimes the question is raised, "Of what use are our Anniversaries?" But that question, it seems to me, would scarcely be started by any one who is in the habit of attending them, and especially by any one who attended that recently held at Adams. In looking over the question, there are several reasons that present themselves to my mind as making them of great importance, a few of which I will mention.

1. It is a time of casting up of our accounts, so as to know how we stand in relation to the financial feature of our operations. It is with a denomination as with a church—it has its financial interests and duties, and it is important that they be vigilantly looked after. But it is not only necessary to look to the simple idea of debt and credit, but all the objects sought to be promoted by the application of these funds, and also the instrumentalities employed, are carefully to be noted. Worthy objects and efficient instrumentalities are indispensable to success in every sense of the term.

2. It is not only a time for settling the question as to the healthy or unhealthy state of the finances, but also as to the healthiness of the institution itself, whether considered as a whole or in reference to its parts. We may be deceived, possibly, if we judge of the healthy state of the institution by the condition of the finances. It is granted, that as a general thing people will not give their money for objects in which they do not feel an interest. But after all, do they not frequently give, when solicited, without any other than a general interest? If this be so—and I think it will not be doubted—then it is clear that that deep and personal interest, which brings a sense of responsibility and produces devotion to a cause, may not, after all, exist. But the gatherings to which we refer are eminently calculated to reach that point. "Iron brighteneth (sharpeneth) iron; so a man brighteneth the countenance of his friend," (Prov. 27:17,) is a true saying; so that these meetings are not only a test of the public feeling in reference to these questions, but are essentially promotive of those feelings which are so necessary to efficient action. Whose heart is not moved when he witnesses the cheerful but earnest countenance, the heaving bosom, and the falling tear—when he listens to the language of love, as it comes streaming forth like the gushing fountain?

3. How these gatherings are calculated to cement the affections of brethren, and cause them to love each other with a purer love! How unmistakably does the necessity of union appear! Ah, how strong is union!

I feel in my heart, that our late Anniversaries will be attended with the signal blessing of God. For one, I feel refreshed, and am renewedly encouraged to the work assigned me as an humble laborer in the vineyard of the Lord. N. V. H.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Sabbath among the Chinese Insurgents.

GLASGOW, September 30th, 1853.

The Overland Mail, with accounts from India, has just arrived, but without farther information, so far as yet appears, in regard to the Sabbath that the insurgents observe. The date is Hong Kong, August 6th, but it is stated, that they have had little intelligence from the interior since their last dispatch. According to the latest information, however, the patriots are still progressing. From Shanghae, we learn that Mr. Meadows, (our Consular interpreter,) and a missionary, had gone to Chin-kiang-foo, to have an interview with the leaders. We have examined the different London papers of yesterday, to see if the name of the missionary would be given, but without success. In the accounts by last mail it was stated that Mr. Taylor, the American missionary, had gone among them at Chin-kiang-foo, and that, at an interview he had obtained, he had "ascertained that the insurgents observed Saturday as their Sabbath." I am induced to notice this, from the fact that the Sabbath Recorder has remarked, that no accounts confirm the statements of Mr. Wardner on this point. The words above quoted I read in the London Nonconformist of Aug. 31st, and in an Edinburgh paper of the same date, although they seemed to me to be deliberately excluded by many other papers, which gave the context in which they stood. They seemed to form part of an extract from either The Friend of China or The North China Mail. The statement went on to say, "Mr. Carpenter, an American Baptist, had essayed to reach the insurgent camp, but after reaching about twenty miles beyond Woosung, the refusal of his boatmen to proceed any farther, had compelled him to relinquish the attempt."

I am in hopes that the account of the leaders in this mighty movement may prove true; for there is frequent allusion in our accounts to their knowledge of Scripture, being chiefly of the Old Testament, which the church would gladly have it be believed is the only part of divine revelation which sanctions the observance of the seventh day. A great movement has, therefore, been made, to have a million of New Testaments printed immediately in China; and the British and Foreign Bible Society have already intimated their forwardness in the work. It is true, indeed, that Dr. Legge speaks of the insurgents observing the Christian [Sunday] Sabbath; and Dr. Medhurst says, "their Sabbath occurs on the same day as our Sunday;" but, if we mistake not, neither of these divines have yet been among them. It cannot be long before clear and unequivocal evidence be furnished upon the point. We shall then indeed be delighted to find that God's law is truly observed by those heading a movement of such magnitude, and that a mighty nation are not only taught to destroy their idols, but also to adopt God's appointed protest against all idolatry, and witness for Him as the Great Creator, who made all things in six days, and rested on the seventh, and therefore hallowed and blessed it. But the institution and blessing of the Sabbath are independent of man's obedience; and the divine law will in this, as in all other respects, remain obligatory, although the Chinese should refuse submission to it.

THE SCRIPTURES IN CHINA.

The English correspondent of the Independent, after alluding to the intelligence from China, and the light which the last arrival throws upon the views of the insurgents, says that the British and Foreign Bible Society will make fresh exertions to improve the great opportunity presented. At a committee meeting held this week, it was resolved to take measures necessary for the printing and circulation, without delay, of ONE MILLION copies of the Chinese New Testament. Mr. Brown, one of the secretaries, makes known that letters have already been dispatched, urging on our friends in China a further and plentiful distribution of the Holy Scriptures. The sum of £500 has been (in addition to several large grants made recently, as well as in former years) placed at the disposal of our Corresponding Committee at Shanghae, of which Dr. Medhurst is secretary, towards the above purpose, with full encouragement to ask for more; indeed, authority is given them to print the Scriptures, whether of the New Testament or the Old, in whole or in portions, in such form and size, and to such extent, as, in their united judgment, they may deem practicable and expedient.

From the equivocal character of the religion of the insurgents, the New Testament would seem to be the essential necessity. Dr. Medhurst, in a recent letter, says:—

"One of the most singular events connected with this movement is the publication of the Book of Genesis by the insurgent chief, emblazoned with the arms of the new (would-be) Emperor, and at his expense; thus indicating that, if they succeed, they will take upon themselves the circulation of the Scriptures throughout China. In the mean time, it behoves the Bible Society to avail itself of the present opening, and diffuse the Scriptures as widely as possible in this extensive field, until the patronage of the forthcoming dynasty shall make their exertions no longer necessary. When the 'Hermes' was at Nankin, Captain Fishbourne gave two copies of the delegates' version of the New Testament into the hands of one of the leaders, which were received with joy and thankfulness. What wondrous times we live in! Glory be to God on high!"

Rev. Mr. Burns, of Amoy, writes that in company with another missionory, he visited Chang-chew.

"We enjoyed, (says Mr. Burns,) the fullest liberty, both within and without the city, of preaching to large and very much engaged audiences. I do not think that I have enjoyed so fine an opportunity of preaching the Word of Life since I came to China. The people were everywhere urgent in requesting that a place might be opened for the regular preaching of the gospel among them. The American Mission have already sent out two members of the native church, to open an out-station. Since our return, three individuals have come hither, at their own expense, to inquire further into the nature of the gospel."

Mr. Burns states that he has completed the translation of the "Pilgrim's Progress," which will be printed at 4d. per copy.

MISSIONS IN CHINA.

From the "summary view" of the Missions of the American Board, presented at the recent meeting in Cincinnati, we make the following extract, to show how China as a mission field is viewed by that Board:—

"China next opens upon us, in new circumstances vastly interesting to the reflecting Christian. Beyond all question, a victorious army is now in the heart of the Chinese empire, a Chinese army, the leaders of which profess the Christian religion; though probably without an intelligent perception of its nature. They make war upon idolatry, as inexorably as they do upon the Manchoo Tartars; and should they succeed in overthrowing the present dynasty, China will be opened to the influence of the Christian world. Zealous Iconoclasts they are, breaking images wherever they go, and not image-reverencing Roman Catholics. What true religion they have came from the Bible and from Protestants. Their daring enterprise may fail, and be followed by a terrible reaction; but henceforth the Chinese people will be invested with a new and undying interest in the heart of the Christian church.

"Our missions are at Canton, Amoy and Fuhchau; and Dr. Bridgman resides at Shanghae as translator of the Scriptures. These three missions, especially the first and second, and more especially the one at Amoy, ought immediately to be reinforced. It is feared that the principal native helper in the Amoy mission was lately beheaded at Changchau, in the successful reactionary movement of the people of that city against the insurgents, into whose hands the city had temporarily fallen. Just before the outbreak, an extraordinary desire was manifested by a number of the inhabitants to hear the gospel, and he, with several others, went thither to proclaim it. On the whole, the time for giving the Word of Life to the people of China seems near, and it becomes us to recognize the signs of the times, and prepare for a great work in that empire."

EPISCOPAL MISSIONS.

A meeting of the Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church was recently held in New York, at which were present several delegates from England, about twenty American Bishops, and a large number of ministers and laymen. One of the speakers, in urging an increase of domestic missionary effort, called attention to the sad fact that out of the 1,500 parishes in this country, more than 1,000 of them have not contributed one penny toward the cause of missions.

The following extract from a report of the proceedings will no doubt interest our readers:—

The Rev. Dr. Boon, Missionary Bishop to China, regretted that a tendency of blood to his head would prevent him from setting forth the claims of the Chinese Mission to their aid. After a few words of appeal in behalf of the Chinese, he introduced to the audience, Tong, one of his pupils, now a candidate for holy orders.

Tong, in very respectable English, said he owed the blessing of a knowledge of Christianity to the American missionaries, and he thanked God that he, who had once been an idolater, was permitted to be present in a temple, and enjoy the society of not only the clergy of the American Church, but of the English also. When he was about six years of age, Bishop Boon set up a school in his town, and he entreated his father to permit him to go to it. After some time he was sent to it. He there became acquainted with Christianity, and from a knowledge of the dark state of idolatry in which his people were sunk, he felt impelled to become a minister of the Gospel, that he might teach his countrymen the truths of Christianity. He thanked the good people of this country for sending teachers to elevate his people, and he hoped his audience would do all they could to aid in the good work. His people, although they knew not the God of the Christian, were not altogether without a knowledge of the necessity for the worship of a God. He then explained the false faiths professed by the people. He hoped the American and English Churches would unite in teaching them the true religion. For himself, with the blessing of God, he should use his best endeavors for their good.

The Rev. Mr. Syle, a Missionary from China, was then introduced. This gentleman proceeded to describe some of the already perceptible results of missionary effort in China. He exhibited copies of the Book of Matthew, a Prayer, the Ten Commandments, &c., in the Chinese language, and in common use by the people. He asked, if so much had been done in the ten years that the Chinese ports had been open, how much more might not be expected of China in the ten years to come? He regretted, however, that the cause of Missions in China had been slighted by the Church at home—for of 100,000 communicants in the Church, not two cents had been received from each. He concluded by earnestly hoping that the future would be productive of better results.

LIMPING THEOLOGY.

Some weeks since, I was present at a Bible Class conducted by the pastor of a large church, when the following exposition was made. The pastor asked the class, "When did Pentecost commence?—for what was it instituted?—and how long did it last?" There being no satisfactory answer, the pastor said it always occurred on the sixth of May, and on the first day of the week. A young man then inquired, Do you say it occurred always on the sixth of May and first day of the week? An answer was given in the affirmative. He then inquired, Does the sixth day of May always come on the first day of the week? To which the pastor replied, that he found a difficulty in it, but authors said it was so. And thus he left it with his class.

Such an explanation is deemed necessary by "authors" to give some show of argument for keeping the first day of the week as a Sabbath, and a public teacher of religion offers it to his congregation as the best exposition he can give. Alas! for the infatuation and blindness among teachers. If their theology so limbs, how can they expect their disciples to walk straight? J. B.

PUBLISHING BOOKS.

The following letter of Eld. Elias Burdick was read before the Publishing Society at its recent Anniversary, and ordered printed in the Sabbath Recorder.

To the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society:—

DEAR BRETHREN,—At your last Anniversary, your attention was called to the subject of Denominational Literature, and to the importance of harmonizing the sentiments of our people, made up as we are of members from most of the other evangelical denominations, and bringing some shades of our former sentiments with us.

If we could have a complete system of Christians Theology, founded on pure Bible truth, and ably vindicated and defended against the myriads of isms which are floating in our moral atmosphere, surely it would be an object worthy of our highest regard; and no sacrifice should be counted too great to make, within the limits of right and reason, in order to attain so desirable an end. But how is this to be done? It may be said, the mark is fixed too high for any uninspired man or set of men to reach; and yet it is no higher than every one of us should aim. And to unite and settle down the denomination on any thing short of this, if it could be done, would be worse than it is now. If an attempt should be made to adopt a system of theology which contained one doctrine contrary to the teachings of the Bible, and to make it emphatically one of the doctrines of the denomination, some one, it is likely, would see it, and never would subscribe to it; and a division would be the inevitable consequence. Surely, no one ought to subscribe to a doctrine which he knows to be contrary to the teachings of the Bible.

It may be asked, What then can be done? Those who have the ability, and the disposition to write, can be encouraged to write, and the Society can publish their works as the productions of the men who write them. It is true, that there should be some rule by which to have the decision of a suitable set of men on the merits of the works, so as not to publish a mass of sentiments which would be generally condemned by our people, or a work that would not be likely to be useful. The Baptist Publication Society publishes the works of Andrew Fuller, John Bunyan, Robert Hall, and many others, some of whom were not even in their communion; and there is not probably a man in their denomination who would subscribe to every sentiment which is advanced by any one of those authors. But they are all allowed, like Abel, though dead, so to speak to the people; and the people can compare what they say with the Bible, and judge for themselves; and that is the only safe way to use any human production. Yet much good is accomplished; for men are so made to think upon subjects which would not otherwise ever come into their minds. And if our Publishing Society can be the means of giving free circulation to what is, or may be, searched out by men whose minds lead them to consume the midnight oil, new fields of thought may be opened to the people, and old errors exposed and exploded, and we may be approximating that high and holy standard which will be raised in the days of the millennial glory of the church. Should we not, as a people to whom God has intrusted the guardianship of his holy Sabbath, pant for a due share also in the work of chasing the lingering shades of the dark ages in regard to other things from our moral atmosphere, and in bringing the artillery of truth to bear upon the new forms of infidelity and of heresy which are constantly springing up around us?

If a work which is worth publishing can be published by our Publishing Society, it will then be brought at once before our entire people; and they also will have an opportunity of presenting it to multitudes of other people. Religious works can never rise and go unaided upon the wings of the wind, like some novels. Too few, even of Christians, are inclined to patient examination of religious truth—truth which requires labor to understand it. Indifference also to the strictness of truth is a prevailing evil. And unless works of a religious character, though they have merit and even high claims upon the consideration of mankind, can have the aid of some society, as the center and motive power of a people widely scattered over the world, they must work their way into general usefulness by slow degrees, and their authors will have long mingled with the ashes of their fathers before their mission is generally felt in the world.

If this Society can be allowed to go into this work, with a due regard to the merits of the works which they publish on the one hand, and without fear of offending or disturbing the feelings of either the old standard-bearers in the denomination or the new auxiliaries to our ranks on the other, then we may see the day-star of hope arising for the great mission of the Society to go on; and so we may perform our part in blessing the world with the genial rays of the rising glory of truth and righteousness. The Society will also then secure the confidence and liberal support of the whole denomination, and find a place in the warm affections of the people.

It is true, that the work of publishing the Sabbath Recorder, and other periodicals, is a good work, and worthy of our support. But if the Society is to stop here, and not go into the work of publishing books, on something like the above-described liberal plan, then the sooner we have one organized that will do it, the better; for it is a work which should be by no means neglected by the denomination.

If the Society can proceed upon this liberal plan, men can be selected, within a reasonable distance, when a work is offered for publication, to sit down with the author and examine it, and on their recommendation let the Board feel safe in publishing it. These men can be appointed by the Board, when a work is offered; or the examination can be left to the Board, or provided for in whatever way the discretion of the Society shall determine.

Respectfully submitted for your consideration, ELIAS BURDICK.

THE DENOMINATIONAL BUILDING.

Seventh-day Baptists are beginning to feel the importance of having a Building in the city of New York for the accommodation of their Missionary, Tract, and Publishing Societies. All that is necessary to secure that most desirable object, is for each one to subscribe promptly what his deliberate judgment tells him is his part. The subject has been presented, as yet, to comparatively a few persons, most of whom have subscribed something, and many of whom have said they would rather double their subscriptions than that the object should fail. Ten thousand dollars is the sum wanted, and that can be raised without seriously embarrassing any body, if the people think so, and act accordingly. We believe they will do it, only give them a little time to think about it, and an opportunity to express their thoughts in a practical way.

Agreeable to a suggestion at the Anniversaries, we print below the subscription, and the names of those who have already subscribed. This we intend to keep standing, and add from week to week the names of new subscribers. It is hoped that every friend of the object will feel himself called upon at once to forward his name, stating the amount which he is willing to pay to secure a place in the city of New York where the Benevolent Societies of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination may forever transact their business rent free. The money is not wanted at present; we only want to know upon whom we may call for it when a purchase is made; and if there are any who can subscribe only on condition of having three, six, or twelve months to pay in, still let them subscribe, and say when they can pay.

We whose names are hereunto subscribed, promise to pay the sums set to our respective names, for the purpose of enabling the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society to purchase or erect a Building in the City of New York for the transaction of its business, and the accommodation of the Benevolent Operations of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination.

TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

The Regents of the University, having designated De Ruyter Institute as an Academy for the instruction of Common School Teachers, a class will be formed for that purpose, Thursday, December 8, and instruction given for one term of fourteen weeks, as anticipated in the law authorizing the appointment and directed by the Regents in the following words:—

"An Act to provide for the instruction of Common School Teachers." The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

"Sec. I. The Treasurer shall pay yearly, on the warrant of the Comptroller, out of the the income of the United States Deposit, or Literary Fund, not otherwise appropriated, to the trustees of one or more Academies of this State, as the Regents of the University shall designate, the sum of ten dollars for each scholar, not to exceed seventy-five scholars to each academy, who shall have been in such Academy instructed under a course prescribed by the said Regents during at least one-third of the Academic year, in the science of Common School teaching.

"Sec. II. The Comptroller shall not draw his warrant for any amount as above provided, until the Trustees of such Academy shall have furnished to the Regents of the University satisfactory evidence that the course prescibed as aforesaid has been thoroughly pursued by a class previously designated and instructed as common school teachers, and who, the said Trustees believe, intend, in good faith, to follow the said occupation, and shall have obtained a certificate thereof, and presented the same to the Comptroller."

The Regents also direct, "That the Academies be required to exercise scholars in English Grammar, Geography, and Arithmetic, so far, at least, as to fit them for examination as Common School Teachers, and particularly so, in the frequently neglected art of spelling. Students should be habituated to regular drilling and review in these essential branches. If their progress or standing warrant it, they should engage in any other higher branches of English and Mathematical science."

Students in this class, to be entitled to their tuition Free, must remain the entire term of 14 weeks, and at the time of entering, females must be at least (16) sixteen years, and males (18) eighteen years of age. Persons wishing to enter this class, who are not of the prescribed age, or who wish to remain only half the term, will pay at the rate of $5,50 per term.

A series of lectures will be delivered to the class, during the term, embracing "The Art of Teaching," "The Relations and Responsibilities of the Teacher," and various scientific subjects. All applications for gratuitous admission, should be made to the trustees on the day of commencement, Dec. 8th, or previously, to J R. Irish Principal.

KENTUCKY SLAVERY.

A Kentucky Clergyman writes the following to a Western religious paper, as a reply to the charge, that the feeling in favor of Slavery was on the increase among the New School Presbyterians in Kentucky. He says:—

"Out of the twelve hundred members of our church in Kentucky, there are but seventy-five slaveholders. We have two colored elders appointed by the session to look after the interests of their brethren. All the children of colored members are baptized by myself, and admitted to the Sabbath School under teachers of their own color. Their spiritual interests are cared for in pastoral visitations. It is the custom, besides giving their servants abundant food and clothing, to give them a portion of their time, or a certain quantity of land, for their own exclusive use and benefit. Not long since, meeting a servant of one of our church members lounging idly about, on the day given him to labor for himself, I said, 'Fleming, I fear you are becoming lazy.' He replied, 'O no, Mr. M., I found free Jim's family starving last fall, and I hires him to work my land.' On inquiry, I found it true as Fleming said. He hired the negro to work for him.

"Three of our ministers are slaveholders, and of these, two would be glad to have all theirs run off to-morrow to your side of the Ohio River; and the other has very seriously embarrassed himself to emancipate his slaves. Besides, there is not a church in the Synod where the spiritual interests of the blacks are not cared for, and in more than two thirds of them, special preaching appointments are made the year round, for their exclusive benefit.

"I cannot say that we are inclined to Abolitionism; but if one of my members were to separate husband and wife, or parent and child, for his peculiar benefit, we would discipline him as quickly as for any other crime. So we would for maltreatment of slaves."

Accidents last Sabbath.—The Delaware River, near Philadelphia, was the scene of a dreadful calamity last Sabbath (Saturday) morning, about 10 o'clock. Two mud-scows, which were being towed from the dock below Walnut-st., Philadelphia, to Camden, were swamped by the swell from the steamer towing them. There were eleven men on board, of whom nine were drowned.

There was an accident in New York, on the same morning, from the caving in of a sewer, by which one man was killed, and four others were badly injured.

Had these things occurred on a Sunday, they would probably have furnished another chapter of "Sabbath Accidents." Happening as they did on Saturday—the Bible Sabbath—would it not be well for those concerned to consider whether they are not in some way connected with Sabbath-breaking?

The Sandwich Islands.—At the recent meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, it was announced, that the Sandwich Islands are now Christianized, and are henceforth to be regarded, not as one of the dependencies of the Board, but as a self-sustaining Christian people. This marks an era in the history of missions which can not be contemplated without deep and grateful emotions.

Law and Justice—the Difference.—A case was tried in the Marine Court of New York, last week, which strikingly illustrates the difference between Law and Justice. It seems that Simpson Hamilton sued Minor C. Story, to recover for work and labor on the Panama Railroad. An oral agreement was first set up, which it is alleged was broken by defendant or his agents. The case was amended by suit on an agreement. In defense it was contended that plaintiff and others of the workmen were bound by the agreement. Testimony was taken. Judge Phillips gave an opinion, at considerable length. He considered the written agreement to have been harsh in its terms, calculated to deceive men unacquainted with such things, and that the equities of the case were entirely with plaintiff. He and his fellow workmen left this city for Panama under the belief that the written contract they had made was the embodiment of the oral agreement they had entered into, and which secured their pay for all weathers "wet or dry," nor would they have entered the service of defendant, except under that idea. Plaintiff was incarcerated on the Isthmus, and his associates were terrified into a compliance with the terms, till terminated or impaired health removed them. Still plaintiff brought action on this agreement, and the stern rules of law must be enforced, irrespective of persons and classes; and while my sympathies, said the Judge, are with the unfortunate plaintiff, I am constrained to order judgment for defendant, with costs. Judgment accordingly.

The Feast of Atonement.—This feast was celebrated by the Jews, last week, with more than usual strictness. Meetings were held in the various synagogues, and the lengthy exercises of the occasion were attended throughout by large congregations. At the Green-st. synagogue, New York, the Rev. Dr. Raphall preached on the subject, representing the feast as the most solemn and sacred in which men can participate. In giving reasons why that particular day—the 10th day of the 7th month—should be so strictly observed, he said it was a tradition, "that after the fall of Adam he was first received again into the favor of the Lord on the 10th day of the 7th month. On the 10th day of the 7th month was Abraham ordered to make the sacrifice of his son. On the 10th day of the 7th month did Moses come down from the Mount with the tidings of forgiveness to the rebellious and idolatrous of his people; and other manifestations of mercy made by the Lord on this day sufficiently indicated that he desired this should be the appointed time for the manifestation of his mercy."

Scotch Veneration.—A recent number of the Edinburgh Advertiser furnishes the following case, showing the veneration of an American for the home of his forefathers:—

"A party of ladies and gentlemen, amounting in all to eleven persons, arrived at Berwick by the North British Railway on Saturday, whence they proceeded in three carriages to the plains of Flodden. They had with them an infant three or four months old, and the object of their visit appeared to be to have this infant baptized [sprinkled, probably] with the waters flowing through the field of Flodden. They were accompanied by a clergyman, reported to belong to Glasgow. The ceremony being concluded, they returned to Berwick, and left again by railway for Edinburgh. The principals of the party were reported to be Americans, and the father of the child is said to have discovered that some of his ancestors were slain with James IV. at the battle of Flodden. Hence his desire to have his child baptized at that memorable locality, and which had induced him to come from New York. At all events, he stated to some persons whose services were engaged, that he had traveled 3,000 miles for this purpose.

A Lynn Yacht.—A correspondent of the Bangor Mercury, writing from Lynn, has the following notice of an original idea for modeling a yacht. He says:—

"For the marine of Lynn we can say but little. It consists of a dozen sail boats and one yacht of twenty-five tuns. The latter is owned by one of the shoemakers, and its model is his own invention. Having had no acquaintance with the ship-building trade—his business for his lifetime having been rather with soles than keels—the manner in which he set about the construction of his yacht was curious but successful. He shaped rounded billets of wood, of equal bulk, pointed at the ends, affixed the same weight at the point of each, and dropped them at the same height into the water. He selected that which sunk farthest and came up quickest, and sawing it in two lengthwise, adopted the half of it as a model of his yacht. The success of his thought is evidenced in the fact that the vessel won the prize at the Salem regatta in July.

Harvard University.—The number of students connected with the Harvard University is 700, a greater number, probably, than has ever before belonged at one time to any literary institution in America. They are from 28 of the States and Territories of the Union, from the District of Columbia, and from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Canada, Yucatan, British Guiana, Brazil, the Sandwich Islands and Ireland. Law students 142, scientific students 69, divinity students 26, medical students 119, resident graduates 15. There are 326 undergraduates. The senior class contains 88, junior 78, sophomore 93, and the freshman 70.

Such persons, and any others who have since made payments with a view to life membership, are requested to notify the Recording Secretary of the Society, Geo. B. Utter.

☞ The Clerks of the North-Western and Ohio Seventh-day Baptist Associations are requested to send the statistics of their churches to this office for immediate use.

European News.

One week later news from Europe has been received since our last, of which we give below the substance.

In relation to the Eastern difficulty reports are contradictory. On the one hand, they show a disposition on the part of the Sublime Porte to listen to its allies, and admit the claims of Russia, and accordingly we are told that the allied fleets have been brought to Constantinople to suppress any riot that might occur; on the other hand, it is said that the Sultan is angry with the Foreign Minister for having brought the fleets for such a porpose.

On the 25th and 26th September, a violent storm prevailed along the British and Dutch coasts, occasioning much loss of life and property. Rotterdam and other Dutch cities were inundated, and a screw steamer of Amsterdam was lost in the Zuyder Zee, with 100 lives. The iron steamer Cammeston, bound from Hull to Hamburg, was also lost with several lives. The American packet-ship Neva put back to Liverpool, and went ashore in the Mersey. Several passengers in attempting to reach the pier were drowned.

The ship Rhein, from Hamburg for New-York, with two hundred passengers, had put into Portsmouth with cholera on board.

The Overland India Mail had been telegraphed. The dates were, Catcutta, Aug. 20; Bombay, Aug. 30.

The famine continued at Rangoon, with the prevalence of cholera among the Natives, and fever among the British troops.

In China, the insurgents continued their advance on Pekin. The Imperial Government was in great want of money, and provisions were becoming scarce at Pekin. The hired fleet blockading Chin Kiang consisted of eight English and American vessels. Canton was quiet. Foochow dates to July 10 report that the American Consul had native agents busily employed in commercial matters in the interior. The Hong Kong correspondent of the Daily News, under date Aug. 7, says it was currently reported that Mr. Marshall had, on behalf of the United States, offered to the Emperor a loan of $1,000,000, and such active assistance as was practicable. If true, it was stated that the British Plenipotentiary would send an envoy to the insurgents to explain that Britain did not join in this offer.

Four Days Later.

The steamer Atlantic, with European dates to Oct. 5th, arrived at New York on the 16th inst. She brings a report, which is generally credited, that the Turks have declared war against Russia. If this report proves true, a general war of Europe is at hand, in which Austria will doubtless be the ally of Russia, and France and England the allies of Turkey.

Advices from Smyrna, of September 21st, state that on that evening, Martin Koszta, the Hungarian refugee, would sail for the United States, on board the American bark Mimosa. This was to be done with consent of all parties concerned, and thus the matter, so far as Koszta himself is concerned, was settled.

Cholera is spreading slowly in Liverpool. Ten cases, of which the most part were fatal, occurred on board the Silas Greenman, in port with emigrants for New York. A few cases are still reported in London. The malady is subsiding at Newcastle and Gateshead, the deaths since Sept. 1 having been 1,799. In various other places a few cases are noted.

A disaster occurred to the packet ship Isaac Wright, from Liverpool, 20th ult., for New York, with 600 passengers. On the 27th ult., in a fog and storm, she struck on the Irish coast, and although got off, had unshipped her rudder. She was brought into Liverpool by a steam-tug—20 deaths on board.

By this arrival we are informed of the death of Francis Dominique Arago, the celebrated French astronomer, at the age of 68 years.

The case of Miss Cunningham, an English lady, who was arrested for distributing Protestant tracts at the baths of Lucca, continued to excite much indignation among the English in Tuscany. Mr. Scarlett, the English Chargé, had exerted himself actively to obtain her release, but without effect. The Grand Duke, to whom Mr. Scarlett personally applied, declines to interfere with the course of the law, and seems pleased that he has the opportunity to revenge himself upon the English for their interference in the case of the Madiai. The lady affirms that she offended in ignorance of the law. An offense of attempt to proselyte is punishable, by the existing code, with five to ten years' imprisonment.

Self-Sale into Slavery.—A singular instance of a colored man selling himself into slavery was brought out in the Mayor's Court, in Richmond, Va., last week. A man named Jones, a witness in a case of larceny, stated that he was the slave of a Mr. Corrington, while the Book of the Hustings Court showed him to be a free man. On examination, it appeared that Jones was emancipated in Richmond in 1851, and that appended to the evidence of his freedom was an injunction from the Court to leave the State on penalty of being sold for the benefit of the State. Instead of doing so, it appeared that he sold himself to Mr. Corrington, and had actually received part of the purchase money at the time of the sale. The Mayor stated in strong terms his conviction that the whole proceeding was illegal, and that the State had claims for forfeiture, which could be enforced in spite of the negro's self-sale; but for the purpose of bringing the novel question before a higher Court, he had the man held for a hearing before the next Hustings Court, on the charge of remaining in the commonwealth contrary to law.

The great tunnel at Cincinnati will be finished early in 1855. The length is 10,011 feet, of which 965 have been completed. The next largest tunnel in the United States, which is on the Baltimore and Ohio Road, is 4,180 feet long. The width of the Cincinnati tunnel, walled, is 25 feet, and hight 19 feet. There are three shafts leading down to it, the first of which is 119 feet, the second 194 feet, and the third 147 feet. These shafts are all completed. The tunnel commences in the valley of Deer Creek, passes under Walnut Hills, and emerges in a ravine on the northern side.

Two boys were drowned at the foot of South-Seventh-st., Williamsburgh, on the evening of Oct. 12. As the ferry-boat from New York was coming into her slip, she struck against the bulkhead with such force as to precipitate several men and boys into the water, of whom these two were drowned.

SUMMARY.

Capt. J. I. Stevens, master of the ship Realm, in a letter to the Herald, gives the names of seventy ships which loaded at the Chincha Islands with 65,856 tuns of guano between July 14 and September 12. Five of these ships cleared direct for New York with 4,300 tuns; eleven for Hampton Roads with 9,980 tuns; five for Baltimore with 3,920 tuns; one for St. Thomas; the destination of all the others appears to be Callao. They are, however, all American vessels. This will be very acceptable news to the farmers who know the value of this manure, but have been unable to obtain it.

A letter dated England, Sept. 23, 1853, says: The cholera is advancing in its desolating course, not rapidly, but certainly. The progress is southward and westward. Orders in Council, and manifestations from the Board of Health, officially recognize the presence of the dreadful epidemic. In two northern towns 700 persons have died in three weeks. Death follows more rapidly upon the early and often unnoticed symptoms than on the former visitations. House-to-house inspection, medical and sanitary, has been resorted to with great advantage.

There was an imposing parade and celebration near Tarrytown, on Friday, Oct. 7, for the purpose of dedicating a monument recently erected to mark the spot on which Major Andre, the British Spy, was captured by Paulding, Van Wart, and Williams, in September, 1780. The procession included nearly all the Militia Companies in Westchester County, and the Veteran Corps and other bodies from New York, Brooklyn, &c.; also United Americans and Masons from the surrounding districts.

The Detroit Democrat of Oct. 10, says: The office of The Voice of the Fugitive was destroyed by fire last night about 1 o'clock, with all its appurtenances. The origin of the fire is not known, but probably proceeded from some stove or pipe in the building, which was variously occupied for dwellings, barber-shop, printing office, &c. The loss will fall heavily upon Messrs. Bibb and Holley, whose paper will sustain a temporary check; but we are happy to learn that it was insured in a good office—nearly enough to cover the loss.

The same paper says: About 10 o'clock this morning, quite a calvalcade of "chattels" passed our office on the way to the ferry, to take up their abode on the hospitable soil of the Canadas. The party consisted of about twenty persons, men, women and children, with eight teams, well loaded with household "plunder." May they find all their fondest anticipations realized in the new country and home they have chosen.

The Mark-lane Express, that Moniteur of the London Corn Exchange, states, "That the produce of wheat in the United Kingdom will be the smallest gathered for many years, does not admit of question. The average yield will fall materially short in almost every part of the kingdom, independent of which it must be borne in mind that the breadth of land sown was, owing to the unpropitious weather during the seeding time, at least one-fourth less than usual."

Mrs. Catherine Webster, widow of the late Professor John W. Webster, of Harvard University, died at her residence in Cambridge, Monday morning, Oct. 10. She had been sick but 36 hours, though her health has never been good since the fearful event which made her a widow. She was about 50 years old, and was a native of the Island of St. Michaels, one of the Azores group. She was a highly esteemed and accomplished lady. Four daughters, two in Cambridge, and two at the Azores, remain to mourn her loss.

Under the head of "Oysters and Stake," the N. Y. Tribune says: Bennet C. Fowler, the one-armed oysterman, of Fair Haven, Conn., brought into our office yesterday a small oak stake, such as oysterman set to mark the spot where they plant their oysters, about four feet long, upon which upward of three hundred oysters were growing. He states that when first taken out of the water it had upward of seven hundred adhering to it.

A contract has been made for a bridge across the Mississippi River at Rock Island, to be completed by Dec. 1, 1857. The slough on the east side of the island is to be crossed by three spans of one hundred and fifty feet each, and the main channel of the river by five spans of two hundred and fifty feet each, and a draw for the passage of vessels. The total length of the main bridge will be 1,580 feet.

The Country Gentleman commends capacious cisterns to catch the water from the roofs of barns and out-houses, enumerating the following advantages from their use: First, plenty of water for the cattle; second, convenience for showering, washing, and sweeping off feculent matter; third, if in the upper part of the building, it will supply a beautiful fountain; fourth, keep a perpetual pond of water at the foot of the fountain.

In the trial of two liquor cases before the Common Pleas, in Worcester, Mass., Judge Bishop presiding, H. D. Stone, Esq., counsel for the defense, introduced testimony showing that the principal Government witness was an atheist. His evidence was therefore ruled out, in accordance with the law of the Commonwealth on this subject, and the defendant was discharged.

A correspondent of the Builder strongly recommends the universal use of Indian ink in preparing all manuscripts intended to convey information to future ages. The inks used by our forefathers contained carbon, and that substance is the base of Indian ink.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

Miscellaneous.

Knud Iverson, the Boy that would not Steal.

Doubts having been expressed in some quarters as to whether the statements relative to the death of this Norwegian boy were strictly true, the Rev. Mr. Anderson, pastor of the Evangelicat Lutheran Church, publishes a letter in the Chicago Democratic Press, in which these doubts are put to rest, and the character of the noble boy is more fully exhibited. Mr. Anderson says :—

Knud was sent after the cows, and another boy was with him. When up by the toll-gate, or between the toll-gate and the river, they (Knud and the other boy) met some larger boys, who talked to them about getting apples out of Mr. Elston's garden. Knud refused to go and steal, as requested by the boys. They then enticed him with them to the river to swim, but the other boy went off, and Knud they got with them. And from the evidence of a German boy, who saw them and was on the bank of the river, at a short disatnce off, when the murderers had "ducked" him, it seems that they renewed their request that he should go and steal apples for them, as he was an entire stranger, having never been on the premises; and on his positively refusing, they took and "ducked" him until he was dead. When those boys came on shore, the German boy asked what they had done with Knud, if they had killed him, &c. They told him that he was dead, and that he should not tell his father of it. They then ran off in the greatest fright. This boy having took Knud's clothes, carried them to his (Knud's) father, and told him, "These are Knud's clothes, and some boys drowned him up in the river."

This, I understand, is the statement made by the German boy who was there and saw them. This same German boy says he knows those boys by sight, as they all attended the public school together last winter; but he does not know their names. He further states that he has never been able to get his eye on but one of them since; and although search has been made, even he has been missing since the German boy discovered a house where he went in.

This is a brief statement of the circumstances as I have learned them.

But my main object in presenting any facts to the public, touching this matter, was to say something about the boy's character. I have known him since I have been in Chicago, now nearly six years; his parents have during the whole of that time been members of my church, and being pious people, they trained their children in the fear of God—Knud has not only been a faithful member of the Sunday School in our church, but, as it is a universal practice in the Lutheran Church to catechise all the children, Knud was also instructed in the principles and doctrines of Christianity there. For several years I did not miss him, when the children came to my house every Wednesday, through the whole winter; and we shall commence those exercises again next week, but alas! Knud will not be among us. He had learned that no "thief shall enter the kingdom of heaven."

From the knowledge I have of his character, it is utterly impossible that he would yield to threats or promises in doing willfully a wrong act. Nay, whenever any thing happened to him and his surviving brother which their parents would not approve of, Knud always went from a consciousness of duty and confessed the whole. But I need not enlarge; this is by no means the only circumstance that testifies of his character. He was known by his fruits, long before he fell a martyr to honesty; and I doubt whether he, or any one, would have stood the test without a thoroughly established character before; and his previous conduct is the most conclusive evidence to us.

Ice in Mild Weather.

This is the way to collect ice in mild winters: It is well known (says a Scotch paper,) that when the thermometer is at or below thirty-two degrees, or freezing, especially with a blue, brisk wind, a fine jet of water, forced by pressure, through a small punctured aperture, into fine spray, falls to the ground in the form of powdered ice. An accidental leakage in a water pipe, a few years since, drew the attention of the gardener at the pleasure grounds to the fact that a considerable quantity of ice had collected from the one small fracture in the course of a single night, and the following day he improved on the hint, by suspending a leaden pipe at a height of nine or ten feet from the grass, in the open air, in a northwardly aspect; the pipe being filled with water from a head considerably higher, and punctured with holes made with a fine awl-blade. The result was as anticipated—ice formed continuously and rapidly, and the frost continuing a few days, crowbars were required to remove the blocks which had accumulated on the grass; and every bush, shrub, or other substance, within the reach of the showers of spray, was coated in the most fantastic, and even beautiful, though grotesque forms. Ice is freely used through the summer by the gentleman owning the ground; and although there is no sheet of water that will freeze within a moderate distance, still, if any frost happens in the course of a winter, there is nothing but seizing the right moment required to fill the ice house with solid and durable ice.

The Street Musician.

The other day, as I came down Broome street, I saw a street musician, playing near the door of a genteel dwelling. The organ was uncommonly sweet and mellow in its tones, the tunes were slow and plaintive, and I fancied that I saw in the woman's Italian face an expression that indicated sufficient refinement to prefer the tender and the melancholy, to the lively, "trainer tunes" in vogue with the populace. She looked like one who had suffered much, and the sorrowful music seemed her own appropriate voice. A little girl clung to her scanty garments, as if afraid of all things but her mother. As I looked at them, a young girl of pleasing countenance opened the window, and began to sing like a bird, in keeping with the street organ. Two other young girls came and leaned on her shoulder; and still she sang on. Blessings on her gentle heart! It was evidently the spontaneous gush of human love and sympathy. The beauty of the incident attracted attention. A group of gentlemen gradually collected round the organist; and ever, as the tune ended, they bowed respectfully towards the window, waved their hats, and called out, "More, if you please!" One, whom I knew well for the kindest and truest soul, passed round his hat; hearts were kindled, and the silver flowed in freely. In a minute, four or five dollars were collected for the poor woman. She spoke no word of gratitude, but she gave such a look! "Will you go to the next street, and play to a friend of mine?" said a kind-hearted friend. She answered in tones expressing the deepest emotion, "No, sir, God bless you all," (making a courtesy to the young lady, who had stept back, and stood sheltered by the curtain of the window,) "I will play no more to-day; I will go home now." The tears trickled down her cheeks, and as she walked away, she ever and anon wiped her eyes with the corner of her shawl. The group of gentlemen lingered a moment to look after her, then turning to the now closed window, they gave three enthusiastic cheers, and departed, better than they came. The pavement on which they stood had been a church to them; and for the next hour, at least, their hearts were more than usually prepared for deeds of gentleness and mercy. Why are such scenes so uncommon? Why do we thus repress our sympathies, and chill the genial current of nature, by forms, observances and restraints?

The Endicott Pear.

Our readers recollect the account which we published a few months since of the Endicott Pear tree in Danvers, Mass., which tree is coeval with the first planting of the Massachusetts Colony, and is probably the oldest fruit tree on this Continent. We have received from the proprietor of the estate on which this pear tree is located, Mr. Charles M. Endicott, a lineal descendant from the Puritan Governor, who first embedded its roots in the soil, a specimen of the fruit which it now produces in the third century of its existence. The pear is of a globular shape, of a dark green color, of medium size, or less, and the flesh is juicy and well flavored—and although it is not equal in excellence to some of the best varieties of the present day, it is of a quality which must make it very acceptable as a desert fruit. The tree has borne the present season about three bushels—and appears in a flourishing condition.

This tree is one of the very few living memorials of other days, yet spared by the hand of time to commemorate, as it were, the "first beginnings of the wildernesse-work" of our ancestors on these western shores, and furnishes a not unapt emblem in its own trials, strength, vigor and durability, of the untiring zeal, sacrifices, sufferings, and powers of endurance, so eminently exhibited by them in the accomplishment of that noble enterprise.

Early Seed Corn.

Farmers are too negligent in selecting corn for the next planting. The usual way is to wait until the crop is gathered, and then while husking to select some of the best-looking ears for seed, but this is not the best way. My worthy friend, Farmer D., is somewhat noted as the possessor of a superior variety of corn, and on account of its being three weeks earlier than the usual varieties, his neighbors consider themselves fortunate if they can get their seed of him, and he is sometimes annoyed by the repeated drafts upon his choice selection of ears. Now what is the secret of this superiority? Let me tell you, and then let me say "go thou and do likewise." Farmer D. has always planted the common kind of corn, the same as his neighbors, but for quite a number of years he has made it a practice to pass through his field every few days after his corn begins to turn, and select the ears that first ripen, and carefully husk and hang them up. Each lot he keeps by itself, so that he can tell which came off first, which second, &c., and when he plants in the spring, he uses first that which he first selected. By continuing this course of practice, he now has the satisfaction of having his crops about three weeks earlier than his neighbors, besides being of a superior quality. The same principle will apply to all kinds of seed. If you wish early peas, beans, potatoes, &c., just take a little pains to select the earliest ripe, and look out for them next spring when planting time comes. From much observation I am convinced that more depends upon the selection and proper care of the seed, than upon early planting. Have your seed and ground ready, and do not be in a hurry to plant until the ground is well warmed. A very old man has told me that it was time to plant corn when the bobolinks make their first appearance, and not before. Just bear this in mind in connection with the selection of your seed.

A Queer Funeral.

A correspondent of the Norwich (Conn.) Examiner writes :—

"Between fifteen and twenty slaves commenced a stampede from one of the Southern States, not long since, and arrived safely in a city of the West, which is somewhat famous as a gateway out of the house of bondage, when, to their utter consternation, they found that their movements had been anticipated, and every avenue leading from the city was watched day and night for their apprehension. What was to be done? It was hard to think of going back. Scouts reported that it was impossible to elude the vigilance of a well-paid, numerous, and unscrupulous police, which was surrounding the city as a body guard. Those who think colored people do not know enough to take care of themselves, would have given their case up as hopeless. But not so they. Thinking that even a hireling slave-catcher would suffer a funeral procession to pass unmolested upon the public road, a number of carriages were hired, coffin and hearse also procured, and on a summer's afternoon, the careless, passing throng saw, as they supposed, a colored funeral procession slowly winding its way out of the city. The cortege attracted little attention, quietly; and without interruption, it passed several miles beyond the town, where wagons were in waiting. Hearse and carriages were then dismissed, and near a score of the happy children of this model republic (!) went rattling along, under the friendly cover of night, as fast as possible, toward Victoria's cold domains."

Electrotyping.—This admirable process is now applied to the production of plates to print from, and we should think must put an end to the use of Stereotype plates. Electrotyping can now be done as cheaply as Stereotyping, while the plates, being of copper, the the type are much more durable than those produced by Stereotyping. In the Electrotype process most of the labor is done by Electricity. A mould of the type is taken in beeswax. This mould is then put into a liquid containing copper in solution, and a powerful galvanic battery is applied. The electricity extracts the copper from the liquid, and deposits it, atom by atom, in the mould, filling every cavity with the utmost perfection. The usual routine in the principal if not the only establishment in this city, is to make the moulds in the day time, and put them into the batteries just before going home at night. In the morning the workmen find that the Electricity has been steadily at work all night, and has performed its allotted task; beautiful facsimile plates, in solid copper, are taken from the liquid, ready for use. It is by the employment of an agent that never tires or sleeps, that Electrotype plates are produced cheaper and quicker than Stereotypes can be made.

Preserving Fruits in their own Juice.

Thirteen bottles of preserved fruit were exhibited lately at Rochester, N. Y., by William R. Smith, of Wayne county, viz., five of cherries, two of peaches, one of different varieties of currants, one of blackberries, and one of plums.

They were examined by a committee, and found of fine flavor, and the committee expressed the opinion that the art of preserving fruit in this manner is practicable, and that the fruit, when carefully put up, can be made to keep as long as may be desirable.

The method of preserving is thus given to the New York State Society by Mr. Smith :

They are preserved by placing the bottles filled with the fruit in cold water, and raising the temperature to the boiling point as quickly as possible; then cork and seal the bottles immediately. Some varieties of fruit will not fill the bottle with their own juice—these must be filled with boiling water, and corked as before mentioned, after the surrounding water boils.

Fruits can also be preserved by carbonic acid gas. The bottles, after the fruit is put into them, should be charged with this gas under pressure, to expel all the air, and then sealed up.

Tomato Figs.—As the time for preserving tomatoes is at hand, the following recipe may be found useful to our readers. It was received by the Directors of the South Carolina Institute from Mrs. Johnson, to whom a premium was awarded at the last fair for tomato figs :—

Put three pounds of clarified brown sugar to every five pounds of tomatos. They must first be scalded to remove the skin; then place in a stone jar tomatos and sugar alternataly, to extract the juice; in twenty four hours boil them in their own juice until the sugar penetrates and looks very clear, but not so much as to mash them. Very little boiling is necessary. Return them to the jar to remain two days, when you must pour off the syrup; boil it and throw it over them. Let them remain two days, and then shake them from the syrup and dry on dishes, turning them every day for a week of good drying weather in the sun. Should the weather be damp after the boiling is finished, they can remain in the syrup until good weather. When perfectly dry, pack down in small wooden boxes, treating each layer to sifted loaf sugar.

About Turnips.—Turnips may remain in the field till late. They are far less injured by frost than many are inclined to believe. It is very often the case, that turnips are frozen into the ground, and on the frosts breaking up again in the course of a few days, are removed as hard and crisp as before. The action of the soil neutralizes its effects, and sometimes a succession of several weeks of warm weather, after a freezing night, adds as much to the weight and value of the crop as they gained in twice the time before the advent of severe cold. A low temperature is favorable rather than adverse to the development of all the species of the turnip tribe. Cabbages grow rapidly in cold weather; hence the practice so prevalent at present of allowing them to remain out till snow falls. In packing turnips of all kinds, care should be taken to secure them effectually against the light and air. The more perfectly this is accomplished, the greater will be the certainty of their keeping well, and the more wholesome and nutritive will they be found, both for stock and for table use.

[N. E. Farmer.

Preserving Herbs.—There are few persons who would not be occasionally benefited by a cup of good herb tea. I do not mean such as is made from herbs dried in the sun, and boiled for half an hour in an old tin cup; such a mess as that would make even a well person sick, who had ever known a better plan.

By attending to the following directions, all country people can have good herbs; and if they wish to give a city friend some acceptable trifle in return for their dinner when they go into the city shopping, let them roll up and carry a good bundle of various kinds of herbs; for in the city even a very small package costs sixpence, and a large proportion of stems at that.

All kinds of herbs should be picked as soon as they begin to blossom, the dust rinsed off, the leaves and flowers spread on tins or clear paper, and exposed to a moderate artificial heat, till perfectly dry and crispy, then put away in a clean dry place. When required, make the tea just as you would green tea for the table. Herbs are better dried in the shade than in the sun, but a moderate heat from the stove or oven is still better.

Conjugal Affection.—A Madame Adrien D——, living in the quarter St. Paul, had on Sunday a slight quarrel with her husband, and refused to give him a kiss of reconciliation before he left home. As, however, she was devotedly attached to him, having been only recently married, her conscience reproached her with what she had done, and she went after him. But not being able to find him anywhere, she, being of a nervous and impressionable character, pictured to herself that, stung to the heart at her coldness, he had thrown himself into the river. She accordingly determined on not surviving him. She lighted two pans of charcoal by her bedside, and threw herself on her bed to await death. She previously wrote a touching letter, making known her reason for committing suicide, and left it on the table. Late at night her husband returned. He found his wife still breathing. He at once threw open the window, and she recovered sufficiently to ask his pardon. He told her that he had not been angry with her at all, and she then expressed a desire to live. A medical man was sent for, but in spite of all he could do she expired in a short time.

A Scriptural Name.—The Richmond Times relates the following :—

A gentleman traveling in a section of country which shall be nameless, stopped at the house of a pious old woman, and observing her fondness for a pet dog, ventured to ask the name of the animal. The good woman answered by saying that she called him "Moreover."

"Is not that a strange name?" inquired the gentleman.

"Yes," said the pious old lady, "but I thought it must be a good one, as I found it in the Bible."

"Found it in the Bible?" quoth the gentleman. "Pray, in what part of the Bible did you find it?"

The old lady took down her Bible with the utmost reverence, and turning to the text, read as follows: "Moreover, the dog came and licked his sores."

"There," said she triumphantly, "have I not the highest authority for the name?"

Little Benny.—So the simple head-stone said. Why did my eyes fill? I never saw the little creature. I never looked in his laughing eye, or heard his merry shout, or listened for his tripping tread. I never pillowed his little head, or bore his little form, or smoothed his silky locks, or laved his dimpled limbs, or fed his cherry lips with dainty bits, or kissed his rosy cheek as he lay sleeping.

I did not see his eye grow dim, or his little hand drop powerless, or the dew of agony gather on his pale forehead; I stood not with clasped hands and suspended breath, and watched the look that comes but once flit over his cherub face. And yet, "little Benny," my tears are falling, for, somewhere, I know there's an empty crib, a vacant chair, useless robes and toys, a desolate hearth-stone and a weeping mother.

"Little Benny."

It was all her full heart could utter; and it was enough. It tells the whole story.

Ancient Cities.—Nineveh was fifteen miles by nine, and forty round, with walls one hundred feet high, and thick enough for three chariots abreast. Babylon was sixty miles within the walls, which were seventy-five feet thick, and three hundred feet high, with one hundred brazen gates. The temple of Diana was four hundred feet high, and was two hundred years in building. The largest of the pyramids is four hundred and eighty feet high, and six hundred and sixty-three feet on one side; its base covers eleven acres. The stones are about thirty feet in length, and three layers are two hundred and eight. Three hundred and sixty thousand men were employed in its erection. The labyrinth of Egypt contains three thousand chambers and twelve halls. Thebes, in Egypt, presents ruins twenty-seven miles round. It had one hundred gates. Carthage was twenty-five miles round, and so was Athens.

Affecting Incident.—An incident of the most heart-rending character occurred at the inquest of the desolate and ill-starred stranger, Mary Cotter—who died of yellow fever, as a gentleman of the jury informed a N. O. paper, from sheer and absolute neglect! There was the corpse of the mother, pale and attenuated, but still beautiful in death—a child but three months old was evidently seeking for her "milkless breast;" the poor father lay dying at the foot of the corpse—and yet, that smile which is known but to infancy and the angels, was beaming on the baby's face! Suddenly it turned, and with all the earnestness of mature years, fixed a long and steady gaze on a gentleman named Tyrell. Mr. Tyrell was deeply affected; he took up the infant and pressed it to his heart, and, with the consent of the dying father, has adopted the child as his own. May he who feeds the ravens of the valley, and who has said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," bless and reward him for this charitable deed.

Spare that Tree.—Some years ago, says the Rev. William Jay, I had in my garden a tree that never bore. One day I was going down, with my axe in my hand, to fell it; my wife met me in the pathway, and pleaded for it, saying, "Why, the spring is now very near; stay, and see whether there may no the some change; and if not, you can deal with it accordingly."

As I had never repented following her advice, I yielded to it now; and what was the consequence? In a few weeks the tree was covered with blossoms, and in a few weeks more it was bending with fruit. Ah! said I, this should teach me; I will learn a lesson from hence not to cut down too soon; that is, not to consider persons incorrigible or abandoned too soon, so as to give up hope, and the use of means and prayers in their behalf.

Preservation of Grapes.—A traveler who lived at St. Petersburgh during the winter season, states that he ate there the freshest and most beautiful grapes he had ever seen. To preserve they should be cut before being entirely ripe. Do not handle the berries, reject all the damaged ones; then lay the grapes in a large stone jar, holding about thirty gallons; the mouth should be narrow, so that the grapes will not touch each other; fill the spaces between them with millett, cover closely with a stone cover, well fitted and cemented. Over this, paste a thick paper, and let it be hermetically sealed, so as to entirely exclude the air. In this air-tight jar the grapes ripen fully, and acquire a flavor seldom attained by any other method, and are preserved for two years in the best condition.

Cut a Dido.—It is told in history, that Dido, a Queen of Tyre, about eight hundred and seventy years before Christ, fled from that place, upon the murder of her husband, and with a colony settled upon the northern coast of Africa, where she built Carthage. Being in want of land, she bargained with the natives for as much as she could surround with a bull's hide. Having made the agreement, she cut a bull's hide into fine strings, and tying them together, claimed as much land as she could surround with the long line she had thus made. The natives allowed the cunning queen to have her way; but when any body played off a sharp trick, they said he had "cut a Dido," and the phrase has come down to our day.

VARIETY.

"Clyde," an imported draft stallion, and perhaps the best specimen of his class of horses ever in America, died at the stable of Anthony Kilgore, in Mason County, Ky., on the 23d of August, of an affection of the heart. He was bred on the river Clyde, in old Scotland, and imported into Canada West in 1811, then three years old. He had been awarded 28 premiums by various Agricultural Societies in the Canadas and state of New York, and never was beaten. He was purchased by Mr. Kirk, P. A. Cushman and Anthony Kilgore, of Macon county, last October, for $2000.

We find in the Washington Union, an advertisement from the land office, giving notice of the withdrawal from public sale and private entry, of lands lying within fifteen miles of the route of the proposed railroad from Brandon in Mississippi, to Montgomery in Alabama. These lands were advertised for sale or entry, and they are now withdrawn, as the official advertisement states, "in consequence of urgent representations in behalf of the interests of the proposed railroad," above mentioned.

The Boston Medical and Surgical Journal says that there is a man in Fairhaven, Mr. James Webb, aged 58, who, from infancy, has lived in a state of perpetual thirst. Under ordinary circumstances, three gallons of water is rather a short daily allowance for him, and it would be impossible, it seems, for him to live through the night with less than a pailful. With this amount of cold water daily poured into the stomach, Mr. Webb has been in good health and spirits.

Col. Colt's Pistol Factory, at Hartford, employs about five hundred hands, whose wages average $2,50 each per day. Every part of the pistol is farmed out to sub-contractors, and about 200 nice revolvers are turned out every twenty-four hours. Col. Colt has a similar factory in Pimlico, near London, (England,) where three hundred hands—fifty Connecticut Yankees to lead, and two hundred and fifty English mechanics—are at present employed.

It is stated that in making an estimate of the amount of iron contained in the iron mountain in Missouri, enough has been found above its base to make 105,000,000 tons. Now, if 5,000,000 only be converted into railroad iron, it would make 500,000 miles of road; and send off the remainder, at the rate of 1000 per day, and this would employ a railroad over 300 years to remove it.

They have a police in Boston whose special business is to look after truants and absentees from schools. In their last quarterly report, they state that they have inquired into 339 cases of habitual truancy from school, and 113 cases of absentees. They have also dealt with a number of cases of vagrant boys and girls who go about the streets committing petty thefts and leading idle and dissolute lives.

Orders, it is said, have been issued from the navy department, directing a thorough, practical, and an immediate test of the value of Captain Marshall's plan of reefing topsails from the decks of vessels. A large reward was some time since offered by the British Government for the invention of any simple and reliable plan of doing what Captain Marshall supposes he has entirely accomplished.

Some idea of the liberal support extended to the schools of Wisconsin may be gathered from the fact that the amount of the school fund of the State, and the estimated value of the public lands appropriated for schools and colleges, is little less than ten millions of dollars, the interest of which is to be forever appropriated for educational purposes.

The value of the property in Louisville in 1848, when she entered upon the grand scheme of railroad building, was a little over $16,000,000; now, after five years only, it is a little less than $30,000,000, and the city was never increasing more rapidly in population, and never exhibited more evidences of general prosperity. The city has invested about $3,000,000 in railroads.

The sum realized for cattle, sheep, pigs, and fowls, at the sale of Earl Ducie's stock, was £12,917. One boar fetched 62 guineas; five six-tooth Southdown ewes went for £9 a head; a four-tooth ram realized £60; a Cochin China cock, which cost Lord Ducie 40 guineas, produced £28 7s. Several of the purchasers of cattle were from New York.

The Diet of Copenhagen has granted a compensation of $50 for each slave set free in the Danish West India Colonies in 1848. This will amount to about $1,000,000; but one half of this sum will revert to the king, who held many estates at the time of emancipation, and was a large mortgage holder upon others.

The estimated cost of bridging the St. Lawrence, at Montreal, for the Grand Trunk Railroad, is seven millions of dollars. The railroad itself will cost some $50,000,000. The capital is to come from England.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

The prophets, indeed, amid all their denunciations of the guilt of Israel's Sabbath profanation, fully contemplated this final happy issue; and often have they set it forth to Israel, and to us, as a motive to the right discharge of present duty. While, in their instructions, connecting as a consequence and punishment their deprivation of privilege with indulgence in sin, the extent of privation so sustained was by the prophets fully anticipated and declared. When, under divine inspiration, Jeremiah pours forth his Lamentations for the desolation of Israel, it forms one of the most pathetic of his moving strains, that "her adversaries saw her and did mock at her Sabbaths." Lam. i. 7. And, again, acknowledging Jehovah's hand in the infliction of His righteous judgments, the prophet exclaims, "How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in His anger, and did cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Israel, and remembered not His footstool in the day of His anger!" "The Lord was as an enemy; He has swallowed up Israel; He has swallowed up all her palaces; He has destroyed His strongholds, and has increased in the daughter of Judah mourning and lamentation; and He has violently taken away His Tabernacle, as if it were of a garden; He has destroyed His places of the assembly; the Lord has caused the solemn Feasts AND SABBATHS to be forgotten in Zion." Lam. ii. 1, 5, 6. But faith and hope pierce through the cloud; and, even while denouncing divine judgments for Sabbath profanation, the prophet of the Lord is enabled to foresee and foreshow the blessed period when Sabbath observance and national blessing shall be fully and joyously restored. The sin of Judah, the procuring cause of her sorrow, was written as with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond; and Jeremiah exclaims, "Thus said the Lord unto me, Go and stand in the gate of the children of the people, whereby the kings of Judah come in, and by the which they go out, and in all the gates of Jerusalem, and say unto them, Hear ye the word of the Lord, ye kings of Judah, and all Judah, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem that enter in by these gates; thus saith the Lord, Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the Sabbath day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem. Neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the Sabbath day, neither do ye any work; but hallow ye the Sabbath day, as I commanded your fathers. But they obeyed not, neither inclined their ear, but made their neck stiff, that they might not hear, nor receive instruction." "If ye will not hearken unto me, to hallow the Sabbath day, and not to bear a burden, even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched." Jer. vii. 19–23, 27.

But while judgment is thus denounced against Sabbath profanation, observe, in the same paragraph, the nature, extent, and duration of the privileges promised by God to true Sabbath sanctification. "And it shall come to pass, if ye diligently hearken unto me, saith the Lord, to bring in no burden through the gates of this city on the Sabbath day, but hallow the Sabbath day, to do no work therein; then shall there enter into the gates of this city kings and princes sitting upon the throne of David, riding in chariots, and on horses, they and their princes, the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and this city shall remain for ever." Ver. 24–26. They hallowed not God's Sabbath aright; so that His purpose with them and His purpose concerning them were alike unfulfilled. But we are here informed, that had they been truly obedient and faithful in respect to God's Sabbath, the divine blessing, in visible and marked form, would have rested upon them. Witnessing for God, they should have enjoyed, in the very discharge of that duty, the blessing of this divinely-appointed means of spiritual advancement, which would have so fitted them for promoting God's glory, that it would have been consistent with His holiness to continue them in the possession of their land, with a succession of kings of the much-honored house of David.

By their unfaithfulness Israel forfeited this high privilege. Not only has "the Tabernacle of David" been overthrown, but they themselves have been long cast out of their land. And so, prophecy assures us, it shall be until they are taught to see and confess their iniquities—and then the tabernacle of David that is fallen down shall be built again, (Acts xv. 16,) and the Lord God shall give unto our blessed Lord "the throne of His father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 32, 33. The Sabbath shall not then be profaned by burdens being brought in at the gates of Jerusalem. They shall then willingly and lovingly do what the Lord commanded their fathers, and the fulfillment of all His promises they shall enjoy.

But once more we are called here again to remark, that it is not a changed Sabbath of which the prophet speaks. The Sabbath Israel is thus called to hallow, and to their faithful observance of which these promises were given, is the same Sabbath that the God of Israel commanded unto their fathers, and of which the required observance is placed in immediate connection with the glories of the Millennial scene. That Sabbath, so commanded unto their fathers, and the sanctification of which should have ensured Israel's remaining for ever, could not have been designed to be set aside—it could not have been an institution of a temporary character—for upon the continued observance of it depended their permanent prosperity. Jerusalem and her Sabbath should, in that case, have remained to them, not merely till the coming, or the death, or the resurrection of Christ; it should have remained to them "for ever."

Of a similar character is one of the prophecies by Ezekiel. During the captivity of the house of Judah in Babylon, certain of the elders of Israel came to the prophet to inquire of the Lord. (Ezek. xx. 1.) The answer is instructive. The prophet is directed to recount in their ears the history of God's dealings with them as a people, and their aggravated sin in the sad requital made for all His love to and care of them. Complaint is made of their profanation of His Sabbaths through the successive periods of their history, (as exhibited in Section V of this Treatise,) notwithstanding the various means and measures divinely used to bring them to a better state. And while thus referring to their past iniquities—as also to their future transgressions—again does the prophecy relative to these connect itself with better times to come, to which it teaches us to look forward; blending as it does the history of their misdeeds, and God's threatened final purgation of the rebels from among them, with the assurance of their subsequent fidelity, when restored to the promised land, and their enjoyment of Sabbath blessing therein.

They are reminded by the prophet, how Jehovah had brought them out of Egypt, that He might give unto them the goodly land He had espied for them; while He called them to cast away all the abominations they had practiced in the land of their oppression. They are further reminded, that they had resisted these entreaties, and persisted in their idolatries. Brought into the wilderness, there, says the Holy One, "I gave them My statutes, and I showed them My judgments, which, if a man do, he will even live in them. Moreover, also, I gave them My Sabbaths, to be a sign between Me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them." Ver. 2—12.

In Egypt, not only had the Sabbath of the Lord been profaned by Israel, but the God of the Sabbath had been dishonored through their idolatries. But being now about to be brought forward conspicuously among the nations of the earth as His "peculiar people," God revealed Himself more fully unto them in the wilderness, gave them His statutes and judgments, and, by symbol and prophecy, foreshadowed and foretold the predestined work of His Son, their Saviour and ours. Especial reference is here made, also, by the prophet, to God's gift to Israel of the holy Sabbath—His gift to the people He had ransomed, and who had, under oppression, been previously deprived of this the earliest gift of divine love, originally bestowed on all, and too little prized by any—a gift, therefore, not now instituted or bestowed for the first time, any more than the sacrifices, which, though regulated by the law of Moses, had also, from the first, typified the death of Him who is the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. Lost to them as it had been by their own sin, the Sabbath was now again God's gift to Israel for their spiritual profit, to be enjoyed free from interruption and fear of the task-master. God now again gave them its rest and its blessing. Rescued from all which, in their bondage, interfered with its due sanctification, and freed, therefore, from former temptations to profane it, they were in the wilderness called to "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.' And the Sabbath, so observed in faith and love, was not only intended as a means, but also as "a sign" unto themselves and others of their sanctification being from Jehovah, the God of the Sabbath. That Sabbath, duly sanctified, is the appointed and standing memorial of His creative power, wisdom and goodness—of the manner and order of the divine proceedure in work and in rest—and those who truly so observe it, are not only blessed in themselves, but are the conscious evidence and token of a work of divine renewal. For this end, the God of Israel, when He brought His people from Egypt, introduced them again into the full enjoyment of Sabbatic rest; and in this review of His dealings with them, He rebukingly intimates this fact; "I gave them My Sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them."

"WE MAY DO GOOD WHEN WE DO NOT EXPECT IT."—I noticed a young lady in my congregation completely broken down by the consciousness of sin. As I could not well converse with her where she lived, I requested her to meet me at the house of one of my church-members. When I called I was sorry to find with her another young lady with whom I was not acquainted, a Miss P. As I feared she might prove a snare to the other, and prevent the full expression of her desires, I conversed on general topics for a while, hoping she would leave. But as I found that she would tarry, I resolved that if I could not do what I hoped, I would do what I could.

After asking such questions and giving such advice as I thought the case required, we bowed in prayer. Miss P. also bowed. When we arose she was weeping. I then found, that when I entered she was thoughtless on the subject of religion, but the past experience of the other was her experience; the questions put to the other, the Spirit applied to her heart; the directions were the directions she needed; and as I urged the other to yield her heart to Christ, grace aided her to feel that she must yield her heart to him. God had accomplished his own work in his own way, and as the result, both, as we hope, received pardon.

HAVE I DONE WHAT I COULD?

I cannot draw the warrior's sword;
  I would not if I could—
I may not give the thunder-word,
  To drench the field with blood;
But I may act a warrior's part
Within that listed field—the heart.

My path leads not through foreign lands,
  O'er mountain, waste, or lea;
I wander not with pilgrim bands;
  Nor care the world to see;
There may be gems of art in Rome,
But I have choicer gems at home.

I cannot plead with fervent tongue,
  Nor strike the minstrel's lyre;
Or blend its magic tones with song,
  To set the soul on fire;
But I may breathe a "still small voice,"
To make some aching heart rejoice.

'Tis not for me to paint the scene
  The artist's brush portrays—
The laughing hill, the meadow green,
  The sun's cloud-softened rays;
But, surely, I a sketch may paint
Of scenes to glad yon lonely saint.

The sculptor's chisel is not mine,
  Nor mine to mould the clay;
Or make the Parian marble shine
  As with Promethean ray;
But is there no rude shapeless heart
On which to try the sculptor's art?

I am not skilled to heal disease,
  To set the fractured limb;
I cannot straight the crippled knees,
  Or clear the eye-ball dim;
But I may ply that art divine,
The art to pour the "oil and wine."

I have not wealth, or power, or skill,
  To broadcast all around;
The world's wide field I may not till,
  Nor sow its fallow ground;
But little spots are here and there,
Which I may weed of grief or care.

The man of learning and of parts
  Soars far above my path;
I cannot cope with stately hearts,
  Who scorn my ember hearth;
Be mine, while in this dreary wild,
The lot to bless the poor man's child.

ROBERT HALL—HIS SON AND SERMON.

It is generally known, that Mr. Hall did not marry till the year 1808, in the forty-fifth year of his age. In May, 1813, his first son, Robert, was born. He was considered to be a remarkably lovely and interesting child, though Mr. Hall himself, having no peculiar attachment to boys, took no special delight in him. The infant Robert, however, became generally admired for his intelligent appearance, and supposed resemblance to his father, and soon became a great favorite among the ladies. Persons of distinction passing through Leicester would often send to beg the favor of seeing and caressing the miniature Robert Hall. Care, however, was always taken to conceal these attractions from the father, who certainly would not have permitted this species of adulation.

Alas, that the admired little fellow was not destined long for earth! At the end of nine months, in February, 1814, he was taken suddenly ill of croup, and in four hours, almost before danger was apprehended, like the pearly dew drop,

"He sparkled, was exhaled,
Then went to heaven."

This sudden and unexpected event had a most agonizing effect on the father, who till then had not been aware of the extent of his parental affection. As soon as the child expired in its mother's arms, he fell prostrate on the spot, and amid sobs and tears, exclaimed, "The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord—yea, blessed be the name of the Lord!" In this position he continued several minutes, offering the most melting supplications for an entire acquiescence in the Divine will, and acknowledging the wisdom and justice of God in all his dealings.

Early next morning he visited the lovely-looking corpse, and was occupied from day to day in imagining the departure of the spirit, and its flight to another world. He was with difficulty drawn from the room, and very unwilling that the child should be removed out of his sight. In the awful presence of death, he loved to meditate, to pray, and to prostrate himself before the Great Eternal.

In the third volume of the American edition of Mr. Hall's Works, may be found a letter, addressed to one of his reverend brethren a few days after the sad event, in which he says:

"I am greatly obliged to you for your kind and consolatory letter, replete with those topics whence alone true consolation can be deduced. The stroke has been very severely felt by us both, but certainly most by dear Mrs. Hall. She was dotingly fond of our lovely boy. For my own part, I was not at all aware my affection for him was so strong, until he was removed from us; my anguish was then great. It seemed to me as if I felt more on this occasion than I should at the loss of either of my others. This feeling, I suspect, was delusive, and arises from our being incapable of estimating the strength of our attachment to any object till it is removed. I was disappointed in his being a boy; for (recollecting) my own extreme and portentous wickedness, I fancied there was something in the constitution of boys peculiarly tending to vice, and adverse to their spiritual interests. I had also remarked, that females seemed much more susceptible of religions impressions than men. On these accounts I trembled for his salvation, and did not feel the gratitude for the blessing vouchsafed me which I ought. I suspect I greatly displeased God by my distrust of his goodness, and that he saw it meet to adopt this method of chastising me. May it be sanctified as a means of making me humble, heavenly, and submissive! It is a very solemn consideration, that a part of myself is in eternity; in the presence, I trust, of the Saviour. How awful will it be, should the branch be saved and the stock perish! Pray for me, my dear friend, that this may not be the case; but that I may be truly sanctified, and permitted to walk in the fear of the Lord, and in the consolations of the Holy Ghost."

On the Sunday following this bereavement, Mr. Hall appeared in the pulpit at the usual hour, his countenance overspread with peculiar solemnity, and beaming with the devout and tender aspirations of a celestial intercourse, so that no one could be at a loss to see that he had been strengthened from above. This breaking through, in this instance, the modern custom of not appearing in public worship immediately after a domestic calamity, was admirably sustained in the sermon he delivered, written, according to the usual length of Mr. Hall's pulpit "Notes," by the side of the lovely corpse. By the earnest entreaties of a brother in the ministry, Mr. Hall lent his manuscript, with permission to transcribe it; and a copy has been forwarded to the National Magazine by a personal friend of both the author and the transcriber. It is entirely unknown in this country, and nearly so in England.

"I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me."
2 Sam. xii. 23.

We have in this short narrative an awful instance of the sad effects of sin, and a touching display of parental affection. While the child lived, David fasted and wept; for he said, "Who can tell but the Lord will be gracious?" But when the event was decided, "he arose, put on his apparel, and went to the house of God." Here was fortitude and manly resolution! His conduct in this particular deserves imitation. He sought comfort at the house of God; where could he have gone better? It is common for persons under bereaving providences to stay away from the house of God on one or more succeeding Sabbaths; this is accommodating ourselves to the false maxims of society. The public worship of God ought never to be neglected, but should be most attended in seasons of calamity. Who besides God can help you?

The words of the text imply the happy state of the deceased child. "I shall go to him." David did not merely mean that his body would lie in the dust with him, but that his spirit would again enjoy his society. We shall consider the probable evidence that deceased infants enter a state of blessedness.

As we have no direct information on this subject in the Scriptures, this evidence is in danger of losing its power over the mind. Although it has been the prevailing opinion of the pious in all ages, that infants are saved, yet some weak minds are troubled because they have not positive evidence. It is, therefore, a question of considerable moment, as one half the human race die in their infancy. And as it is a point of such importance for the comfort of Christian parents, you will pardon me for bringing the subject before you.

God has implanted in the heart of man a principle of affection toward his offspring. Now, to suppose that the Divine Being should produce sentiments opposite to his own, would be highly absurd. We may instance his gracious regard to the city of Nineveh. He spared it, though its sins were great, because it contained six-score thousand persons who knew not their right hand from their left. And God condescends to give a reasonable motive for his conduct, to show us what disposes him to the exercise of mercy. It is true, when we reason on the compassion of God, we are apt to reason amiss, and to draw many conclusions, forgetting that his justice is armed against all sin. But infants are unconscious sinners; and when there appears no claim of justice to intervene, he is wont to communicate the largest discoveries of mercy. He hateth nothing that he hath made. But to proceed to a more particular consideration of the probable evidence of the safety of infants, we shall remark,

1. That there appears to be no passage of Scripture to necessitate the misery, or to favor the opinion of the future misery of children. It is true, they are born in sin, therefore cannot be saved on account of their native innocence. The hope of immortality and eternal life is entirely founded on the death and medation of Christ. As Adam is the federal head of all our race, so Christ is the spiritual head. All parallels fail in something; with respect to Adam, we only derive from him two things, which awfully prove our depravity; first, a subjection to death; secondly, the transmission of a corrupt nature. We all are found in a state of alienation from God; and this native tree would produce fruit unto eternal death, except it were counteracted by divine grace. Infants inherit the original sin of Adam, and are thereby subject to death; but not to eternal death. To suppose that the Father of spirits would damn infants for the sin of Adam, would be to reflect infinite dishonor on his moral perfections. How is this a state of trial, if the destiny of all is before determined by an irrevocable sentence?

2. All those passages of Scripture which speak of a judgment day have respect to the conduct of men. We have no intimation of the proceedings of that day but what has reference to the actions of mankind. Every man shall be judged according to his works; and as infants, morally considered, are unconscious beings, they cannot violate any known law or established principle.

3. If infants are necessarily consigned to misery in a futute state of existence, then are they in a worse state than any of their fellow-creatures. The gospel is glad tidings, but it never was proposed to them; they are incapable of receiving it. Now, suppose there were a few persons to whom the gospel was never offered, who at a future day should be arraigned at the bar, and condemned for not believing on the Son of God for salvation; would not this reflect dishonor on all the attributes of God? And infants, if they perish, are precisely in this state. If, in reply, you say the heathen are still in this condition, I answer, their case is not precisely the same; they are not left in a state of natural impossibility of salvation; they have a law written in their hearts, and will be condemned for opposition to the knowledge they possess. For instance, the heathen know that gods of wood and stone are not the proper objects of worship; yet they cleave to these idols in opposition to the true God.

4. We refer you to the conduct of our Saviour when he took a child and said, "Except ye become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of God." This may mean, unless you are the subjects of a similar disposition; and if so, it goes to prove our point. He, however, blessed them. This term, "blessed," may be understood in two senses—he either blessed them authoritatively or he prayed for them. If he only prayed for them, it was sufficient; for it was the grand prerogative of the Saviour, that he was always heard in what he prayed for. I would remark, however, that this by no means proves that infants are fit for church membership; it only proves they are the objects of the Saviour's gracious regard. He blessed them; and they were, therefore, emphatically blessed. This sentiment is consolatory to the Christian parent.

But still, as infants are the offspring of fallen Adam, we can only infer their positive happiness from the regard which God has to the sacrifice of Christ. Repentance and faith are the explicit acts of beings when reason is developed; infants are incapable of either. But cannot God produce an immediate regeneration? Was not John the Baptist "sanctified from the womb?" The doctrine of the fall, and a consequent tendency to sin in all our race, is as difficult to be accounted for as that of a tendency to holiness. It is as easy for God to work a divine change upon passive as upon active, rebellious sinners, surely; and it is as equally requisite. If we cannot advance any thing like an absolute demonstration of the positive happiness of infants, yet we may infer it from various parts of Scripture. It is evident that the gospel terms of salvation are designed only for subjects capable of rule and law; but the perfections of the Deity will not admit of the inference of punishment for disobedience as it regards infants.

You who have been bereaved of your children may derive solid comfort from the considerations we have placed before you. How much better is it that they should leave this scene of vicissitude and trial, for a permanent abode of peace and happiness! What indescribable evils do they avoid; and how great should be your joy on their account! They are carried into harbor without crossing the tempestuous sea of life; they are secured in the haven of eternal repose, where storms can never reach them.

Besides all this, let bereaved parents remember how many a child, lovely in infancy, grows up to plant thorns in the breasts of affectionate fathers and mothers. Dry up your tears, therefore; imitate the conduct of David—visit the house of God; acknowledge his sovereign right to dispose of you and your families; and if you have lost kind and affectionate children, let it be a motive to induce you to train up the remaining part of your family for God, lest he should be provoked to blast your olive branches, and leave you destitute of a child to solace your old age.

Finally, let all your earthly bereavements attach you more firmly to Christ. Aim high; set your affections above. The Saviour is now touched with exquisite sympathy; he compassionates your griefs and sorrows, and seeks nothing so much as your sanctification. He dries up the channels, that you may be happily compelled to plunge into an infinite ocean of happiness.

"IT FELL—AND WAS GONE."

A few years ago there was a young man in a southern college who was extremely fond of novel reading. He spent a great deal of his time in devouring exciting tales of fiction; and as a consequence, lost to a considerable extent, his relish for patient and severe study. One night he placed his candle just back of his pillow, and lay down, as usual, to read a new and fascinating novel. He became deeply absorbed in the story; hour after hour sped by; he was in the midst of an exciting scene, when, sudden as a flash, his light was extinguished. Not a second's warning that it was on the wane. It fell in the socket, and was gone. There he was in a highly excited state of mind, left suddenly to his own reflections. The thought rushed with terrific power upon him, "Thus unexpectedly and suddenly thou mayest die, in the midst of the exciting scenes of life." The Holy Spirit deepened the impression upon his mind. He became serious from that moment; changed his course of life; repented of his sins, and gave his heart to God. He is now an able and useful minister of the gospel, in one of the southern States. [American Messenger.

AN EDUCATED MINISTRY.

From a very interesting paper sent forth by the Boston South Baptist Association, at its recent session, is clipped the following timely extract:—

"The devotedness with which our fathers in the ministry served their Master, to the full extent of their preparation, succeeded by the divine blessing, so extended the work in which they were engaged, that they realized, before they died, their need of greater mental cultivation, and at immense sacrifice they began the work of ministerial education for their children. Respect for their memories, and veneration for their judgment, call on us to carry forward what they began, while their experience should teach us the certainty of failure if, with our smaller natural endowments, we refuse to bring to the accomplishment of a much greater work than theirs, the highest cultivation our superior advantages afford. We rejoice that in our denomination there are facilities of every grade for the acquisition of knowledge; the school, the academy, the literary institution, the college, and the theological seminary. So that none called by God to preach need enter the sacred desk without such a preparation as the Providence of God points out. Still, we do most rejoice that we so appreciate a careful and protracted preparation for the solemn work, that we have among us a Theological Seminary now well endowed, with able Professors, and a standard sufficiently high to carry forward our most talented and industrious graduates from college, through a three years' course of additional training. To require any thing less than this here, would be a step backward which we believe the intelligence and piety of our brethren would not sanction. It would be dishonoring the judgment and sacrifices of our fathers, and indolently burying talents which the Lord has given to us for improvement. Let us cherish as are meet exalted views of the work of preaching the gospel of Christ, and humble views of our qualifications, even after the amplest preparation; let us not slight the advantages God has conferred on us for doing a great work, and each year will justify the wisdom that confers on the rising ministry the inestimable privilege of a thorough and systematic theological education."

"HE GIVETH EYES TO THE BLIND."

There lived, in a certain village in England, a poor widow, who had lost her sight through the infirmities of age. As, however, she had derived much comfort during her whole life from perusing the Scriptures, it was impossible for her to spend the few days that might yet be allotted her without at least getting some one to read to her from this holy book; for she had realized in her experience the truth of the declaration of the Psalmist, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path." She lived in a retired part of the village, and the people with whom she boarded were not able to read. There was, however, another cottage in the neighborhood, in which lived a little boy who could read, the son of a shepherd; but ah, he was fond of his play—he did not like to read the Bible. What did the old blind woman now do? She arose one hour earlier than usual, and with her trembling hand earned a penny daily at her spinning-wheel; for what she was able to earn during the remaining part of the day was scarcely sufficient to pay the expenses of her frugal living. With this penny she enticed the little romping boy to her, and induced him to read to her every evening a chapter from the Bible. Now all her wishes were gratified, and she lived very happy in the midst of her poverty, because she was permitted to behold with her spiritual eyes the glorious grace of God which he has revealed in his Word. Yea, she praised God with a cheerful heart, and was accustomed often to say, "Thy testimonies have I taken as an heritage forever; for they are the rejoicing of my heart. The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage."

REMEDY FOR FITS.

Though no doctor, I have by me some excellent prescriptions; and as I shall charge you nothing for them, you cannot grumble at the price. We are most of us subject to fits. I am visited with them myself, and I dare say that you are also. Now then for my prescriptions.

For a fit of envy, go to a watering-place, and see how many who keep their carriages are afflicted with rheumatism, gout, and dropsy; how many are subject to epilepsy and apoplexy. "A sound heart is the life of the flesh; envy, the rottenness of the bones." Prov. xiv. 30.

For a fit of passion, walk out in the open air; you may speak your mind to the winds, without hurting any one, or proclaiming yourself to be a simpleton.

For a fit of idleness, count the tickings of a clock. Do this for one hour, and you will be glad to pull off your coat the next, and work like a hero.

For a fit of extravagance and folly, go to the workshop, or speak to the ragged and wretched inmates of a jail, and you will soon be convinced—

Must be content to lie forlorn.

For a fit of ambition go the church-yard, and read the gravestones; they will tell you the end of ambition. The grave will soon be your bed-chamber, the earth your pillow, corruption your father, and the worm your mother and your sister.

For a fit of repining, look about you for the halt and the blind, and visit the bedridden, and afflicted, and deranged, and they will make you ashamed of complaining of your light afflictions.

For a fit of despondency, look on the good things which God has given you in this world, and at those which he has promised to his followers in the next. He who goes into the garden to look for cobwebs and spiders, no doubt will find them; while he who looks for a flower, may return into his house with one blooming in his bosom.

For all fits of doubt, perplexity, and fear, whether they respect the body or mind—whether they are a load to the shoulders, the head, or the heart, the following is a radical cure, which may be relied on, for I had it from the Great Pyhsician—"Cast thy burden on the Lord; he will sustain thee."

NOTHING LUDICROUS IN THE BIBLE.—An old author, in reproving a clerical friend for attempts at witticisms in the pulpit, says:—

"I recollect but one humorous passage in the Bible, which is that of Elijah with the Baalites; and when the time, place, and circumstances, are properly considered, nothing could be more seasonable, nor so effectually expose the impotency of their false gods, and the absurdity of their vain worship. The prophets often speak ironically, sometimes satirically, but I do not remember of their ever speaking ludicrously. Our Lord and his disciples never had recourse to any such methods. The short abstracts we have of their sermons and conversations are all in a serious strain, and ministers cannot copy after better examples."

No one loves to tell a tale of slander to another who does not love to hear it. The arrow never sticks in the rock, but sometimes rebounds and wounds him who hurled it. Learn, then, to rebuke and check the detracting tongue, by showing that you do not listen to it with any pleasure.

TRACT DISTRIBUTION.

One of the most important agencies for enlightening the world is Tract Distribution. We refer to it now for the sake of inviting attention to some resolutions adopted at our late Anniversary; particularly to the one recommending to the several churches "to raise funds for the purchase of Tracts, and to appoint suitable agents to distribute them when they may find inviting and promising fields." We speak advisedly, when we say, that the Society did not adopt this resolution as a mere matter of form. It was adopted in the hope that our churches would act, and go into the work of Tract Circulation with new vigor.

What we wish to say is this:—That churches are not to suppose that, because the work is committed to them, the fields in which they are to operate must needs be in their own immediate vicinity, so that their work may be done at the least possible expense. We do not think the Society contemplated the doing of the work upon so limited a scale. If it come to the knowledge of a church in Rhode Island that there is an inviting field of labor in Pennsylvania; or to the knowledge of a church in New Jersey, that there is a good opening in Virginia, or in Tennessee; we suppose that it should be regarded as something like a Macedonian call upon these churches, respectively, to enter into the fields thus brought to their notice, by sending out colporters well freighted with Tracts for circulation among the inhabitants. Such kind of labor, we suppose, would fulfill in some degree what the Tract Society intended by its resolution.

As for the more limited operation of churches in fields adjacent to their own locality, we certainly do not undervalue it, nor would we deny that it does, in part, answer the intention of the Society in the resolution referred to. Certainly, those near home are not to be neglected for the sake of those at a great distance, especially if the nearer ones look like fields whitening for the harvest. But it not unfrequently happens, that the people in the vicinity of a Seventh-day Baptist church are the most unlikely of all others to give the Sabbath question a fair investigation. They have so long accustomed themselves to pervert the obvious teachings of Scripture on this most important question, that they cannot see the light, though it shine ever so brilliantly. There is but little hope for them. However, let even these be continually admonished, in faithfulness and in love.

On the supposition that churches will look out for inviting fields, where they may scatter the seeds of truth, and will resolve upon acting efficiently in the matter, we suggest, that it is not necessary—though in some cases it may be desirable—to send out a minister as colporteur. In our opinion, too much importance has frequently been attached to having one employed in this business who can argue the point well, and can deliver lectures to the people as he goes. We think it were often better to have one who knows how to hold his tongue. Sometimes, it is true, a public argument is valuable; but in the majority of instances, people prefer, upon a question that involves a complete revolution of their practice, to think the matter over quietly, without being subjected to the chafings of dispute, or to such importunities as one who earnestly maintains his argument is likely to employ. They want to take time for consideration; the [illegible] to them. And we do believe, that the quiet, unobtrusive way of simply depositing a Tract in each person's hand, without stopping to argue the point, will in a great majority of cases produce the most favorable results. Keep your ministers at home, then, if you need them, and employ some good, honest-hearted, amiable brother, whose general deportment will commend him as a Christian, to go out on these errands of good. Let it be some brother who is known to be a man of prayer, and who, after he has circulated his little books, will go to some secret place, drop down upon his knees, and implore the God of Truth to accept and bless the labor performed. His fervent prayers will do more good than a thousand noisy arguments.

Now, as it is not necessary to send out a minister, nor even a person of considerable talking abilities, as colporteur, it is evident that every church has within itself all the requisite agency for fulfilling the intention of the Society. And if all the churches in the Denomination would wake up in earnest to the work, we think that the year to come would show more accomplished for the cause of truth, than any previous year of our Denomination's existence.

But the mode of operating contemplated involves expenses. If a Rhode Island church, or a church in the State of Wisconsin, should send a colporter to Virginia, or Tennessee, or Michigan, it would cost something. His expenses must be paid, his labor compensated. And, alas! so many of our churches think that if they do but sustain (or half sustain) ministers within their own bounds, they are doing all their duty, and a little more, that to suggest the duty of sustaining Tract Distributors also at any considerable expense will, no doubt, seem like the imposition of an intolerable burden. But do not be alarmed, brethren; you have yet, even the best of you, hardly made a beginning towards those sacrifices which duty to the Lord Jesus Christ demands. You are far, far behind your duty. It is high time that you awake out of sleep, and understand that your mission is to redeem your fellow creatures from ignorance and sin. Open your purses, then, and not only sustain your ministers, but your Tract Distributors also. Talk not about expense; what is that kind of service worth which costs nothing? Your money was deposited in your possession, that you might use it in doing good; think whether you can make a better use of it than in the way we propose.

JOHN FREDERICK OBERLIN.

Thanks for the lives of the great and good. Thanks for the influence of their examples. "Principles instruct us—precepts guide us—but example moves us. Example is principle and precept embodied, living and in action. We not only see what is done, and what ought to be done, but what can be done, and how it is done. It appeals to all of our faculties at once; it fixes the attention, engages the imagination, instructs the judgment, moves the heart, subdues the will, awakens the conscience, and assists the memory." Such being its influence, it is well that we should hold frequent converse with the lives of those that have left to us the rich legacy of their noble deeds. We were forcibly reminded of this while reading the memoirs of Oberlin.

JOHN FREDERICK OBERLIN was born at Strasbourg, France, August, 1740. His parents, though not in affluent circumstances, were very well educated, and devoted much time to the careful instruction of their children. The subject of this sketch was early noted for his benevolent spirit, united with a good degree of chivalry and daring. He was ever ready to assist the needy and defend the oppressed, even at the risk of his own reputation or life. Being ardent, enthusiastic, and susceptible, the prayers, religious songs and reading of his mother made a deep and lasting impression upon his mind. He resolved to devote himself to the ministry. While a student of Theology, he was induced by his mother to attend the preaching of Dr. Lorentz, which, if not the origin of, at least gave a more evangelical turn to, his piety. At the age of twenty, he made an entire, an unreserved consecration of himself to the Lord. He completed his educational course about this time, but continued seven years longer in private life, either studying or teaching. During this time, he seems to have been schooling himself, unconsciously perhaps, for his future sphere. He formed habits the most simple and self-denying. He generally prepared his meals in a pan hung over his study lamp.

While living in this simple and secluded manner, he was solicited by M. Stouber, a Lutheran minister, to succeed him as pastor to Waldbach, in the mountainous canton of Ban de La Roche, or Steinthal, in the north-eastern part of France. This was a cold and sterile region. Stouber found the people semi-barbarous, speaking the old Patois dialect, the French language of the twelfth century. The canton had been desolated by wars. The roads being destroyed, there was no communication with the surrounding country.

But it was a region where the rights of conscience were inviolate and sacred. When it was incorporated as a part of France, it was stipulated, that here liberty of conscience should be enjoyed. Persecuted Protestants, from time to time, had fled to this spot for safety. Although safe, yet, from the nature of the region, they lived in a state of the utmost misery and degradation. Their ignorance, also, was deplorable.

M. Stouber, on his first visiting Waldbach, wished to see their school-house. He was shown into a miserable cottage, filled with children in a wild and noisy state. It was with difficulty that he could find the master. At last he found a decrepit old man lying on a bed in one corner of the room. When Stouber inquired of him, what he taught the children, his frank reply was, "Nothing, Sir." "Nothing! how is that?" inquired Stouber. "Because I know nothing myself." "Why then are you instituted school-master?" "Why, Sir, I had been taking care of the Waldbach pigs for a great number of years, and when I got too old and infirm for that employment, they sent me here to take care of the children." The name of school-master had become so contemptible, that it had to be changed to that of Regent, before any one qualified could be found to enter upon the duties of teacher among them.

Oberlin entered upon his duties. At first, he found great difficulty in overcoming their prejudices. He often run narrow chances of being mobbed. To rescue his parishioners from their half-savage state, he built roads, supplied implements of husbandry, and established a sort of bank for lending money. The young men were sent off to learn trades. Habitations were previously hewn from rocks or dug in the sides of mountains. Under the superintendence of Oberlin, suitable cottages were constructed. For many years previous to 1709, the people had lived upon wild apples and pears. From this time till Oberlin, they lived chiefly on a degenerate species of potatoe. He planted fruit and ornamental trees—introduced new varieties of vegetables and grains—gave lectures on agriculture—formed an agricultural society—had the young instructed in chemistry and botany—distributed prizes to successful farmers—thus employing every means for supplying their physical necessities, or adding to their comforts. He was assisted in these efforts by pecuniary contributions from his friends.

Neither did he forget their intellectual or religious wants. He established one of the first, if not the first infant school that was ever organized. In order that he might have suitable teachers for such schools, he took young ladies into his own family, and trained them for the work. He built school-houses—made books—changed their language from the Patois to the pure French—established concerts of prayer, with various other means of religious instruction, besides the stated duties of preaching. He was, at the same time, minister, teacher, author, farmer, mechanic, and physician.

The effects of his labors soon began to manifest themselves. The feelings of those rude mountaineers were very soon changed from prejudice and aversion to love and admiration. They soon began to practice his precepts, and emulate his examples. When he first went there, the inhabitants could go to church only by turns, borrowing each other's clothes for the purpose. His parish was soon converted from one of the most miserable to one of the most prosperous, peaceable, and happy parishes in France. The fame of his doings soon spread abroad. Strangers from various parts of the world were attracted to the spot. During the Reign of Terror, when war and carnage raged over France, when social ties were abrogated, property confiscated, ministers imprisoned, Waldbach was an asylum—Oberlin prosecuted his labors unmolested. The Royal and Central Agricultural Society of Paris voted him a gold medal, in acknowledgment of the services he had rendered to agriculture and to mankind—for the perfect model his society presented of social economy. Louis XVIII. presented him with the emblem of the Legion of Honor, as an expression of thanks for the services he had rendered his canton. On the organization of the British and Foreign Bible Society, he, by the request of the Society, became its first foreign correspondent, and, under its direction, organized an auxiliary society at Waldbach, through which means some ten thousand copies of the New Testament were soon put in circulation.

In personal appearance, Oberlin was rather under the medium size—dignified, grave, condescending, affectionate, and polite—very courteous to inferiors, always pulling off his hat to adults, and taking children by the hand, as he met them. The effect of this was soon manifest upon the hardy mountaineers—their remarkable and universal suavity of manners astonishing even a Frenchman. In conversation he was fluent, communicative, and inquisitive. He performed the most trifling acts of life as a religious duty. He decided all questions of doubt by lot, believing in a special Providence. For this purpose, he kept two tickets in his pocket, with yes written on one, and no on the other. In all cases of doubtful action, he, with prayer, drew one of these, and the course to be pursued was determined. He was noted for frugality, never having been known to owe any man. On hearing of the sufferings of slaves in this country, he would use no more of the products of slave labor. Fearing that the paper currency of the French Revolution would become a disgrace to his country, he redeemed all the broken bills that chanced, for the space of twenty-five years, to come into his canton. His preaching was simple, energetic, colloquial, and affectionate, using many familiar figures, allusions, and anecdotes. His doctrinal views were mostly orthodox, differing, perhaps, now and then, on a minor point. When he became so old that he could no longer discharge the duties of a pastor—which was not till he was upwards of eighty—he used to spend most of his time in prayer for his flock. Taking the church register, he would go over the names in order, praying for each individual. After being pastor of Waldbach nearly sixty years, he was called to his rest at the advanced age of eighty-five. A funeral procession, over two miles in length, followed his remains to the grave. The deep-seated affection of his people for him is finely illustrated by an anecdote of one of his servants. One, in tears, being asked the cause of her grief, replied, that she feared there were no servants in heaven, so that she might there wait upon her good pastor. Another anecdote illustrates the power of such a life and character in influencing others to like action. A clergyman was once on a time listening to some one reading the life of Oberlin. Inspired by the noble example, he sprang to his feet, exclaiming, "I too will do something for the poor and needy." Oberlin College was the result.

MEETING OF NEW JERSEY CHURCHES.

The Seventh-day Baptist Churches of New Jersey held their Yearly Meeting with the Church in Plainfield, commencing on Sixth-day, Oct. 14th, 1853, at 2 o'clock P. M.

The delegation from the West Jersey Churches, Shiloh and Marlboro, was quite small, owing to the fact that the brethren of those Churches, being mainly an agricultural people, are, in this month of the year, very busily engaged in their Fall's work. A full attendance was given by the brethren and sisters of the Piscataway and Plainfield Churches to all the exercises of the Meeting. All present seemed to unite in the desire of worshiping God in the spirit of holiness, praying for higher attainments in our Christian pursuits, and a more perfect consecration to the work of glorifying our Heavenly Father.

The Introductory Discourse was preached by David Clawson, from Col. 3: 1—"If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above." The grace of God bestows spiritual life upon the heart dead in trespasses and sins. In our regeneration, the Scriptures represent us as rising, through the merits of our Saviour's atonement, from the destructions of sin to a state of reconciliation with God. Having put on Christ, it remains for us to exhibit to the world, not only an aiming, but a striving for heaven. There is the kingdom of God, to become the happy subjects of which must be our great endeavor. There is the city of the righteous—the New Jerusalem—in which are the dwellings prepared for our sanctified spirits. There is the society of the saints and angels, rendered more blissful by the presence of our Saviour. Finally, there are those sacred employments of casting our crowns at the feet of Jesus, and studying with unveiled vision the manifestations of divine wisdom and power.

After this discourse, the pastors of the several churches presented verbal reports of the state of religion among the people of their charge.

In the Piscataway church, an encouraging interest in religious things is manifested, the prayer meetings are fully attended, and nearly all seem desirous of actively engaging in the cross-bearing labors of the gospel.

In the Shiloh Church, a better religious feeling appears to be reviving in the hearts of a portion of the members; prayers are requested for the unregenerate, and hopes are entertained that the Spirit, which trieth the hearts of men, will again visit them with an unction from Heaven.

The Marlboro church remains spiritually in nearly the same condition in which it was a year since. Strenuous efforts are being made to build another house of worship, and it is confidently expected that by next summer a commodious building for this purpose will be erected.

Preaching Sabbath evening by W. B. Gillett from Matt. 5: 11, 12—"Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven." We are not to expect peace in this life, but the most trying afflictions. Christianity is at war with the wickedness of the world, and the world is in arms against it. Neither are we to expect rewards in this world. The blessings which we receive in the flesh, are not given because they are due us, but through the goodness of our Saviour. All rewards received hereafter are inseparably connected with obedience—with voluntary submission to the will of God. The rewards of the righteous will be received in approbation, and not as a debt. Whether we are saved or not, we are under obligation to serve God, because he is our moral governor. In the Judgment we shall not be surprised to see the poor, humble, despised follower Christ, receiving the highest praises from God. The truly devoted in this life will never meet with bitter disappointments; he will discipline his heart to take cheerfully what Providence sends upon him. We are never satisfied with the attainments of this life, but the rewards which are above will fill with complete joy the spirit of the saint; hence no murmurings in heaven. Better be tried here, so as to be prepared to enjoy greater happiness hereafter.

The Sabbath morning discourse was preached by David Clawson, from Heb. 2: 18—"For in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted." The character of Christ, as an Apostle, Prophet, Priest, Saviour, and Mediator, was briefly alluded to. The nature and intensity of his sufferings are shown in his divine humiliation, in his exposure to temptations, and in the agony of the crucifixion. Christians are expected to honor God, by overcoming all temptations, and enduring all trials, through prayer and watchfulness. To receive aid from Christ in our sufferings, it is necessary for us to renounce the love of the world, to lean upon God entirely for spiritual strength, and render unto him the homage of our highest love. Christ is a wise counselor, because he knows our frame; he is a safe intercessor, because he knows the nature of human frailty; he is an able deliverer from temptation, because he has foiled the arch-fiend in his most insidious designs.

This discourse was followed by one from W. B. Gillett; text, Ps. 36: 2—"For he flattereth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful." He spoke of the delusions of sin, which beguile the transgressor into feelings of peace and security. Some suppose that God regards the general character only, and not every little act of a man. Others imagine that he is satisfied with a partial repentance, which can be delayed till to-morrow or some other future time. Some cry, all is well, when their peace is not made with God. Many are deluded in thinking there is no necessity of present humiliation, because they have mortified their natures sufficiently, when they put on Christ at some past day. He concluded by showing the enormity of these sins, and indicating the way of escape from them through the grace of God.

After the morning services, the sufferings and dying love of our Saviour were commemorated in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper.

Preaching in the evening after the Sabbath, by H. H. Baker, from Luke 13: 20, 21—"Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? It is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." The theme of the discourse was religious progression—illustrated in part by the processes of natural and intellectual progression. In the physical world, the most stupendous results often proceed from insignificant causes, and hang balanced for a time in uncertainty, by the least attenuated thread of circumstances. The intellect, in its progressive developments, commences with the mere rudiments of knowledge, and advances slowly, but surely, until it is able to predict events which will happen a thousand years in the future. The existence of the church at one time depended on a single promise—subsequently on a single individual—soon after, all its members met in one room—but now it is as widely spread as the boundaries of the earth. You all can recollect when your consciences were first slightly touched by the feeling of your infirmities, and subsequently aroused to the full view of the exceeding sinfulness of your sins. The Christian's advancement, from the time of conversion until he reaches heaven, was delineated.

Preaching First-day morning by David Clawson, from Ps. 89: 15—"Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound; they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance." The joyful sound spoken of in this passage refers to the sound of the trumpet of jubilee, which was blown to proclaim liberty to the enslaved. It is a beautiful illustration of the power of the Gospel, the legitimate object of which is to set forth truth for the salvation of men. In proclaiming gospel truth, one must have the grace of God abounding in the heart. Many of the blessings which the lover of God receives were enumerated.

In the evening following, preaching by W. C. Whitford, from Phil. 1: 27—"Only let your conversation be as becometh the gospel of Christ."

In the Business Meeting, First-day afternoon, W. B. Gillett being Chairman, on motion of David Dunn, it was voted, that hereafter the Yearly Meeting of the New Jersey Seventh-day Baptist Churches be held so as to alternate regularly with the East and West Jersey churches; and that the next Yearly Meeting be held with the Marlboro church, on Sixth-day before the third Sabbath in November, 1854. On motion of I. D. Titsworth, it was voted, that a synopsis of the discourses and proceedings of this Yearly Meeting be furnished for publication in the Sabbath Recorder.

NOTES BY A CORRESPONDENT.

Journey West—Northwestern Association—Palestine Mission.

We left Albion, Erie Co., N. Y., September 5th, and in one hour and a half were set down in the village of Niagara Falls. A company of six of us, including a tall Kentuckian, hired a carriage for $4, the cheapest we could find, and soon we were crossing the justly-celebrated Suspension Bridge, on our way to the Cataract on the Canada side, via Lundy's Lane and the Burning Spring. Two hours brought us to Table Rock, where the visitor has a view of the foaming sheet in all its indescribable grandeur. At different points on our way thither we saw the Falls, and the different directions of the rainbow; but here we saw the watery element leaping and frolicing, and seemingly mad and frantic in her glory. We stood within a foot of the edge of Table Rock, and, as we since learn, within three or four days of its fall—of eternity! gazing and admiring, and felt ourselves exhilarated, fearing, yet drawn and almost chained to the spot; and oh! what thoughts we then had of the majesty, power, wisdom and dominion of that Being at whose bidding this mighty stream continues to flow on, and pour and roar from age to age! We were urged to go under the sheet, and were inclined to pay our half dollar, but our time was too limited; so we saved that for the poor.

Arrived at Buffalo in the evening, we had a pretty fair demonstration of the pow-wow of the cabmen and runners of that place. Certainly, if they ever exceed the racket and confusion, the pulling and hauling and swearing of that evening, we tremble for the traveler and sojourner, lest a similar fate to that of the cities of the plain befall them. One followed us some distance, pressing very earnestly the claims of the Central Michigan Route, and when informed that we were bound by the Southern Michigan, he vociferated, at the same time extending his hand: "Good-bye, Sir; good-bye, man; if you have any children with you, I advise you to take a school marm with you; for they will be twenty-one years of age before you get there; good-bye, Sir, farewell!"—and with a volley of good wishes, evidently designed to make us feel good-natured, he reluctantly backed out!

The promise was, "through to Monroe in fourteen hours." The Lake was remarkably smooth, but the boat did not arrive at M. till long after the train had left; so we put back (as it seemed to us) to Toledo, where, at 6 P. M. of the 6th, we took cars for Chicago. Delayed that night, by some fault of the iron horse, we did not reach the boat for Milwaukee (on Lake Michigan) in time for our baggage to come on board. But some of us were on board, and the boat was off. The writer stopped at Waukegan, and returned to Chicago in search of his and others' baggage. Found all, and returned next day, arriving in Milton the evening of the 8th.

Here, for the first time in our life, we set foot upon prairie soil, and looked with delight upon the great expanse—"of bottom land—flat as a pan-cake—fat as grease." The friends in Milton received us with open arms, welcoming us to as hospitable homes as any Seventh-day Baptist deserves—good enough for that people, and, we had almost said, too good for those who are not; but we will say, hospitality as cordial, comforting and unbounded as is to be found any where. We verily believe the brethren of our order are remarkable for the manner and matter of entertainment. What we have said of Milton will apply to all whom we visited West. The pastor, Bro. V. Hull, was absent on a visit to Dakota. His supply, Eld. Coon, took the writer from house to house on his agency. At first it was thought fifty dollars was all they could raise for the Palestine Mission; but, without urging or screwing, their donations amounted to $158 37. We found the Albion church building an Academy, yet their liberality abounded to the amount of $34. The Christiana church, a feeble band, but growing, gave $24 25. It is with heart-felt gratitude that we mention the aid rendered in collecting by the pastors of these churches—Elders Z. Campbell and A. W. Coon.

Through the kindness of Elder V. Hull, we were carried to Walworth, where the North-Western Association convened on the 22d ult. The sessions throughout were very harmonious and spirited. The discussions showed that the brethren were not behind in their views of duty and their zeal in the cause of Reform. Indeed, it was one of the most pleasant and refreshing Associations we ever attended. We heartily wished for the presence of more of our Eastern brethren, that they might realize how good it was to meet with kindred spirits, and so many of them, in the home field of the Far West.

Eld. O. P. Hull, the pastor at Walworth, is doing a good work. His people are all united with him as a brother beloved and successful in advancing the cause.

Our interview with Eld. Varnum Hull was peculiarly gratifying. His eye had been upon Free Missionists, and our own course in former years—was well acquainted with the rise of McGrawville College—the change of Sabbath views, and the trials incident to our becoming Seventh-day Baptists. Never shall we forget his eloquent plea for the slave, and the principle of Free Missions, before the Association. Nor shall we forget how our hearts melted as water at parting. The Lord bless his servant with grace and holy boldness to earnestly and successfully advocate the cause of Christ.

The Walworth church contributed $58 72 for the Palestine Mission. A pledge of — dollars was to have been redeemed at the meeting, but the brother was detained at home by illness. Fifteen dollars forwarded by the Southampton church, and the prospect of ten more from the same, swelled the above amounts to the comfortable sum of $300, which is doing well for people in a new country, and may be received as a pledge of material aid for years to come.

Of the richness of the soil, the beauty and advantages of the country in which our people are located, the half has not been told; we hardly dare speak our mind lest we be not credited. We now have full faith in Wisconsin, and we think that all who go there must, if they can leave at all, come away regretting that they had not sooner believed the many truthful reports concerning the intrinsic worth of that goodly land. Milton, Albion, and Christiana, are pleasant locations, with many farms for sale, among which are some rare chances for new comers. The brethren at these places agreed that we should see a fine country at Walworth; and, sure enough, a more beautiful prairie than Big Foot, need not be desired; had our visit been in summer, we should have thought it a near neighbor to Eden.

WM. M. JONES.

MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.—A recent number of the Chinese Repository contains a carefully prepared schedule of the missionaries of the several societies who have been engaged in the Chinese Mission, from the arrival of Dr. Morrison, in 1807, to the close of last year, from which it appears that the total number is 150, of whom 73 are now in China, and five are absent on account of ill health or for other reasons. Of the remaining seventy-two, twenty-five died in the field of labor or on the passage home, including four who were drowned, and three who met a violent death at the hands of the natives. Forty-eight have retired; most of them on account of their own ill health, or that of their families, but some of them through discouragement at the little progress they made in learning the Chinese language. Of the whole number, forty-seven were Englishman, eighty-eight Americans, and fifteen came from the continent. Of the missionaries now in China, including the five now absent, twenty-three are Englishmen, five are from the continent, and twenty-four are from America.

A DAY OF PRAYER FOR BURMAH.—The Convention of Baptist missionaries at Maulmain, in April and May last, after a protracted and laborious session, in which the principles and methods of missionary action were thoroughly discussed, and plans were laid for the prosecution of the great work which the opening of Burmah sets before them, passed the following resolution:—

Resolved, That, in view of our dependence on the blessing of God for success in the great work in which we are engaged, and especially in anticipation of the increased efforts about to be put forth for the evangelization of Burmah, we will individually, at the stations with which we may be severally connected, set apart the first Thursday in November next as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, humbly to supplicate the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon ourselves and the perishing multitudes for whom we labor; and that we will invite the native churches with which we may be connected to unite with us in this exercise.

A KAREN CHURCH MEETING.—Mr. Thomas thus describes the proceedings of the church at Yaville, which at the time of his visiting them, received for baptism fourteen converts:—

"One who has only been in the church meetings in America can have but a faint idea of what our examinations are here. Many of the candidates were aged persons, who had studied no catechism, who were unable to read. They had only been taught the first principles of our holy religion. Hence it was not in consideration of their attainments in theology that we accepted them. They knew only that they were sinners, that Christ died to redeem sinners, and that they trusted alone in Him. They wished to be baptized in order to obey the command of Christ. When I had ascertained as much as this, I would turn to the assistant and the members of the church, and inquire what had been their manner of life during the year—if they had acted like Christians. I had, it is true, some misgivings, but could not but ask, 'Can any man forbid water, that these should be baptized?' I durst not. The church unanimously received them. The judgment will disclose the correctness of our decision."

THE MAINE LAW IN ENGLAND.—The Temperance men in England are about to petition their Parliament for a prohibitory liquor law. There are 2,527 licensed brewers in the British Islands, 88,400 persons licensed to sell spirits and wine, and 88,658 licensed to sell beer. In 1851 there were 31,000,000 gallons of spirits consumed in Great Britain in one year, with nearly 6,500,000 gallons of foreign wine. The whole amount thence accuring to the public revenue is over fifteen millions sterling. It will be seen, from this statement, that the Temperance men have a formidable opposition to encounter.

LONDON CITY MISSION SOCIETY.—This is the largest Society of the kind in the world. It employed last year no less than 297 missionaries, who were constantly engaged in domiciliary visitation. The number of visits they made during the year was 1,240,318, and they distributed 1,766,131 religious tracts. In their visits, they read the Scriptures on 379,687 occasions; they held 20,417 social religious meetings; they induced 2,317 adults to attend public worship, and 6,783 children to attend Sunday schools.

The New Reformation in Ireland.—Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, D.D., recently delivered several lectures in New York on the Reformation now going on in Ireland, in which large numbers of Papists are turning Protestants. He stated that "The Irish Reformation Society," composed of ministers of the Church of England, had four years ago "only 14 ordained missionaries, and the whole number of their agents was only 95. Since then their number had been augmented, until now they could count 45 missionaries, and the total number of their agents was 359. In the year 1848 they had located but fifteen stations, but now they have missions in twenty-seven of the thirty-two counties of Ireland, together with thirty-four local Committees constantly carrying on the good work in which the Society is engaged. During the last year the voices of four hundred pulpits had proclaimed the truths of Protestantism, and preached against the errors of Romanism. Some few years ago the Lord Archbishop of Tuam announced his approval of their work, which was hailed with joy by the Society. But now the Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin also give their support to the movement; and not only these, but the Episcopal rulers throughout Ireland give it their countenance and active coöperation. This Society was accomplishing an immense amount of good in various ways, and gospel truths not only went forth from the pulpit, but they had a novel mode of carrying on the warfare by posting placards at every corner of the streets and on fences in country districts, on which were printed, in bold letters, a few words designed to arrest the attention of the passer-by. In the last year, 43,750 of these placards had been posted, and during the same period 700,000 handbills had been distributed about. It was impossible to walk the streets without having one of them thrust into your hand."

A Newspaper Agent worth having.—The St. Louis Western Watchman has the following notice of a prompt and efficient agent of that paper—a man the like of whom do much to forward the cause for which they themselves are professedly laboring, while nominally serving others:—

"One of our most devoted Missouri ministers, a genuine Kentuckian, by the way, whose zeal in extending the circulation of the Watchman is worthy of imitation, lately baptized a Methodist, as his venerated father has done many times. On transmitting his name as a subscriber, he says, 'I hardly let the hair of his head get dry, before I said, Now, Brother C., you are a Baptist out and out, and you must let me send your name as a subscriber to the Western Watchman. He readily consented; so you please send him the paper at once.'

"This brother makes it a rule to get all whom he baptizes, or unites in marriage, to subscribe, for he considers the Watchman one of the essentials of Christian housekeeping. And he does his work so promptly that he is successful. His rule is to 'make hay while the sun shines,' and to 'strike while the iron is hot.' That is the secret of success."

A Prayer Answered.—The Petersburg Democrat tells a story of a little boy of that city, who, having recently lost his father, found himself debarred thereby from attending school as formerly, and, in the fullness of his faith, he determined to seek the wherewithal, at that footstool to which he had doubtless been taught to look for other and higher blessings. In the simplicity of his heart he sat down and gravely wrote a letter to his Redeemer, thinking, perhaps, that so formal a mode of preferring his requests would meet with greater attention. What was the surprise of the postmaster, Wm. N. Friend, Esq., on discoveing among the contents of his letter-box, one morning lately, a missive directed to "Jesus Christ!" Opening it he read the story of the boy's wants, and with a noble kindness, which we are not selfish enough to deprive our readers of the pleasure or profit of hearing, he deposited in the envelop the amount required, and directed it to the young supplicant.

Results of Missionary Labor in Africa.—Rev. J. L. Wilson, a retured missionary of the Old School Presbyterian Church, from Africa, recently stated, as among the results of missionary labor in Africa, the gathering of more than one hundred Christian churches, containing ten thousand hopeful converts; the establishment of a hundred and fifty Christian schools, in which from twelve to fifteen thousand youth were receiving Christian and other instruction. The Bible has been translated, and its truths brought into contact, directly or indirectly, with a million of human minds. They had given to Africa eighteen written dialects; and all this without grammars or teachers, or any extrinsic aid; and this had been the work of Protestant missionaries within the space of twenty years.

Fasting and Prayer for Preachers.—The New York East Conference, at its last session, adopted the following preamble and resolution:—

"In conformity with the recommendation of the last General Conference, for the annual conferences to appoint days of fasting and prayer, with a view to pray the great Head of the Church to call forth more laborers into his vineyard, it is hereby

"Resolved, That the second Friday of December next be set apart for that purpose, and that it be observed in all our worshiping assemblies."

Persecution in France and Germany.—The Baptist Missionary Magazine contains a letter from Northern France, stating that in one department the Baptist chapels are all closed, and their public worship completely suppressed. The Macedonian states that in Hesse Cassel and Mecklenburg Schwerin, the most stringent measures are taken to repress all Baptist meetings. Hesse threatens martial law, and in Mecklenburg the preachers are forbidden to leave their respective towns.

Missionary Bishops.—The General Triennial Convention of the Episcopal Church, in session in New York last week, elected two Missionary Bisohps, viz: Rev. W. J. Kipp, of Albany, N. Y., for California; and Rev. T. F. Scott, of Georgia, for the Territories of Oregon and Washington.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

A letter appears in the London Patriot from the Rev. I. J. Roberts, of Canton, which gives a partial confirmation of the report that the chief of the insurgents had formerly been instructed by him. Mr. Roberts has received a letter purporting to be from the prince, which speaks affectionately of their former acquaintance and of the instructions he received. The writer says that he has the control of several provinces, that myriads worship God daily and keep the commandments, but are very ignorant of the gospel. He desires Mr. Roberts to go to Nankin, to preach and administer baptism.

The Congregationalist states that a large Protestant book-store has been opened in Constantinople, in the very heart of the city. On its shelves are found copies of the Scriptures in twelve different languages, and thence have gone forth, during the past year, more than 10,000 copies of the word of God, besides other religious books and tracts, in the various languages of that part of the world. $400 worth of the Scriptures in the Arabic dialect have been sent into Russia during the same period.

It is said the Old School Presbyterian Board of Education has 96 academies under its care, embracing about 3000 pupils; in all of them the truths and duties of religion are inculcated by Christian teachers; their discipline is both mild and strict, and they are founded on the substantial basis of classical and mathematical study; the blessing of God is on them; several of them report more or less instances of conversion—one sixteen, another eighteen, and still another between fifty and sixty.

A writer in the Central Christian Herald, in enumerating the different religious sects in eastern Ohio, mentions, among others, the Omish and Nanese, which, he says, are divisions among the Nennonites or Harmless Christians. The difference between some of them is said to be the wearing of buttons instead of hooks and eyes, while the length and split of the coat tail is the great matter of controversy with others.

Rev. Dr. Jenkins, of the Shanghai Mission, M. E. Church South, delivered a lecture on China in Cincinnati, to an audience of twelve or fifteen hundred persons. A native Chinaman, whose hair, braided, extended down his back to his heels, accompanied the Doctor, and was the object of much curiosity. A large collection was lifted toward building a Methodist church in Shanghai, China.

There are now in Kentucky some ~~six~~, or seven free churches, having no fellowship with slavery. These have met with opposition and persecution. This is daily diminishing; access to the public mind is more easy, and the sphere of influence is continually increasing—though these are yet "the days of small things."

The Episcopal Church of the State of New York has expended nearly $4000 in endeavoring to discipline one of its Presbyters, Rev. W. F. Walker, and the business is not fully completed. The counsel for the church have had to argue six imperative motions before the civil courts of the State, and one served upon the Bishop is not yet disposed of.

There are ten contiguous counties in Virginia, containing on an average a population of 7,000 each, in which there is not a single Presbyterian minister; and though something has been done to meet their spiritual wants by the Baptist and Methodist denominations, a large proportion of the people are as sheep without a shepherd.

Rev. Jonathan Sawyer, of Garland, Me., attended the recent anniversary of Bangor Theological Seminary, though ninety-seven years old. He was the first minister in Orford, in that State, and when the Seminary at Bangor was projected, took an active part in the enterprise. He is still vigorous in mind and body.

Two thousand five hundred members, above all removed by death or in other ways, have been added to the Wesleyan Methodist church in Canada the past year, as the results of numerous spiritual refreshings.

The average salaries of pastors and stated supplies, in New Hampshire, during the last year, i. e., from August to August, was $377. Low as this is, it is 14 per cent. higher than it was ten years ago. The average salaries of pastors of self-supporting churches is $502.

The English papers furnish unfavorable news from Madagascar. The Queen was still pursuing a course of rigorous hostility towards the Christians, who were suffering greatly from her persecutions.

The degree of D.D. has been conferred by Hanover College on Rev. Elias Riggs, late of Smyrna, but now of Constantinople, and for the last twenty-one years missionary of the American Board.

The Methodists of Maine are taking measures to raise $25,000 for the establishment of a female collegiate institute.

"World's Horse Convention."—A Convention assuming this popular title was held at Springfield, Mass., last week. The number of people in attendance was very large, ranging between ten and fifteen thousand. On the last day of the Convention between five and six hundred of the finest horses on the Continent entered the inclosure in procession, and were ridden or driven, nearly all of them by their owners, twice around the course, while 10,000 delighted spectators rent the air with shouts of applause and high satisfaction—a large and efficient Band pealing forth their strains during the passing of the great tournament. In the afternoon the was a grant banquet, with seats for 1,800 persons, which were all filled, many of them by ladies. Among the speakers on the occasion were Governors Seymour, Abbot Lawrence, John M. Botts, and Ex-Governor Floyd.

A Ship for Shanghae—the Horatio—is advertised to sail from New York on the 15th of November. By her we shall send all letters and parcels on hand for our missionaries. This is the first opportunity of the kind for several months, and it is uncertain when there will be another.

The packet ship Havre, Mulford, reports that on the 9th instant, lat. 41 42, lon. 58 80, she was boarded by a boat from ship Sagadahoe (of Bath,) Capt. Leister, from Gotenburgh, bound to Boston, which had lost during the passage 38 passengers by cholera. The captain's wife was very sick, and 14 passengers in a low state from sickness.

European News.

The steamer Asia, with European dates to Oct. 8th, arrived at New York on the 20th.

The chief point in the advices brought by the Asia is that the declaration of war, voted by the Grand Council of Turkey on the 27th ult., was not actually signed by the Sultan on that day, as we were informed by the Atlantic. The Ambassadors of the medating Powers at Constantinople were still hopeful of a peaceful settlement of the difficulty, but the warlike feeling was very high there.

The case of Miss Cunningham in Tuscany continues to excite considerable religious animosity.

Serious riots had broken out in Syria. Two hundred persons were killed in an outbreak in the Province of Naplouse.

A letter from Smyrna, dated Sept. 23, states that Martin Koszta had that day sailed for the United States.

There were 20,143 prisoners in the jails and houses of correction of England, on April 18 last.

Cholera had broken out with great violence on board the packet-ship Isaac Wright, which struck on a rock, on 28th ult., off Cape Clear, and had to put back to Liverpool. Before the ship reached the Mersey, 47 passengers were thrown overboard, and several others died in harbor and were carried ashore. The remainder of the sick were carried in carts to the hospitals, where a large number, it was impossible to ascertain the exact number, had died.

A dreadful accident occurred on the Great Southern and Western Railway, at Straffan, near Dublin. A cattle train ran full force into a passenger train, and literally dashed it to pieces. All the cars were broken to fragments, excepting one, which, attached to the engine, was propelled by the shock of the collision to the distance of nearly three-quarters of a mile! Ten or twelve persons were killed, smashed so that their bodies could scarce be collected. Fifty persons were wounded, some of whom cannot recover. The cause of the accident was sheer stupidity in the drivers of the cattle-train, who, by-the-bye, escaped unhurt.

The Edinburgh News describes a magnificent carpet just completed by Templeton & Co., Mile End, Glasgow, to order for the White House. The carpet is of the patented Axminster fabric, and is the largest ever made by Messrs. Templeton, being 80 feet in length by 40 wide. The portion woven in the loom without seam is 72 feet by 31, and the remainder consists of a handsome border sewed on. The "filling-in" is a ruby and crimson damask, with three tasteful medallions in the center, and rich corner pieces to correspond. The medallions are filled with bouquets of flowers, designed and executed with exquisite taste. The entire piece weighs upward of a tun, and its value is between £450 and £500 sterling—$2400.

A North-West Passage Discovered.

We learn from The London Globe, that "dispatches have been received at the Admiralty from Commander McClure, who sailed in Dec., 1849, in search of Sir John Franklin, in H. M. S. Investigator, and from Capt. Kellett, who sailed in the spring of 1852, in H. M. S. Resolute, on the same mission. We regret to say that no traces toward success in the main object of their mission have been discovered; but we have been favored with communication of a letter from Commander McClure, dated H. M. S. Investigator, Bay of Mercy, Baring's Island, April, 1853, which announces his success in accomplishing the long problematical enterprise of the North-Western Passage. The gallant writer states that during the winter of 1850 his vessel wintered in pack, without sustaining any damage (and, surprising to say, he has to report the same result at the end of the third winter, and without the loss of a single man of her crew) in the frozen waters called Prince of Wales' Strait, and communicating with Barrow's, as he ascertained on Oct. 26, of that year. In July, 1851, he states: 'Such a body of ice came upon us with a strong east wind, and set the vessel so far to the south, that we determined to attempt a passage by the east end of the cliffs of Banks Land, forming the north entrance of the large island under which we now are.' The difficulties and dangers of this passage may be estimated from his statement that the ice floes encountered measured from forty-five to seventy feet beneath the water, and only six or seven above. It is interesting to learn that inhabitants have been discovered further northward than known previously, at Wollaston and Victoria Lands, and northward still on the tract designated as Prince Albert's Lands. These were found exceedingly kind and friendly, and great quantities of copper were found, apparently in a very pure state. This metal is used by the natives for edging their weapons, &c., but they appeared to be amused at seeing pieces of it picked up by the crews, as possessing value. In April, 1852, Commander McClure went to Melville Islands on sledges, expecting to find there one of Captain Austin's vessels, or, at all events, a store of provisions; but was disappointed to find only a notice left by Lieutenant McClintock, saying where provisions were, and giving the position of their ships. It was inferred that the search was supposed to be abandoned, and no other vessel expected to have come thus far. Since October, 1851, the crew of the Investigator is stated to have been put on two-thirds allowance—half a pound of meat per diem in a climate where their commander states they could readily have consumed four. On the hills adjacent to the bay from which the letter is dated, large numbers of deer and other game have been found, which must have contributed a welcome relief from the short-commons of the previous polar sojourn. The only portion of Captain Kellett's letters with which we are, as yet, made acquainted, is the brief notice dated Melville Island, 7th May, that 'McClure had joined about a fortnight, all well, but half-starved.' From Capt. McClure's own letters it appears that he had already detached some of his crew to return home by Baffin's Bay, and a small party by the Mackenzie."

The question whether all the railway employees in England should wear beards, is discussed on sanitary grounds. Some did recommend it as a preventive against cold, in a letter signed by guards, inspectors, engineers and firemen. In France, the railway employees wear beards as a protection against cold. In Russia, the beard is the great protection of the male inhabitants against severe weather. It is considered an ordination of nature.

SUMMARY.

Oct. 20th, a man about 40 years of age, named Frederick J. Fuller, who, for the last five months, has occupied a back basement at No. 219 First-av., New York, was found sitting in his room, in front of the window, dead. Coroner Gamble held an inquest upon the body, when evidence was adduced showing that the deceased had been very secluded in his habits, and had not been seen by any person in the house since the previous Tuesday. The body was examined by Dr. Higgins, who gave it as his opinion, that death was caused by want of suitable nourishment, and the Jury rendered a verdict to that effect. On searching the person of the deceased, $20, mostly in three cent pieces, were found in his pockets; and a bank book, showing deposits in his favor to upward of $2,800, was found in his trunk.

The Cincinnati Enquirer of Oct. 24, says that in Clayton County, Iowa, an immense lead mine was lately discovered by Messrs. Holmes and Dickason, who have taken out 120,000 lbs. of mineral within the last four weeks, and have another 100,000 in sight. The lead is considered good for 1,000,000 lbs. It is said to be found on the surface of the upper strata of magnesian limestone, and about eighty feet below the surface of the earth, at the highest point of the ridge running east and west, and directly across the ridge. The mineral is said to be of the best quality, bringing at this time $31 per thousand pounds.

We yesterday saw (says the Tribune of Oct. 21) a striking illustration of mechanical ingenuity in the case of Mr. J. M. Stamford, of Medway, Mass. Mr. S. lost both legs by an accident some two or three years ago, one being amputated above and the other below the knee, and has since had their place supplied by artificial limbs, made by Palmer & Co., of Springfield. With these he is able to walk perfectly well, either forward or backward, and without crutch or stick, though in going about the street he generally uses an ordinary cane. He goes up or down, gets into a carriage, or takes a long walk, without difficulty, and no one from his appearance would suppose his limbs to be artificial.

A dispatch dated Detroit, Wednesday, Oct. 19, 1853, says: An alarming fire has been prevailing of late in the woods and swamps, and has now reached within a mile of this city. 10,000 acres of swamp have been completely burnt over, destroying all houses, barns, fences, &c., in its course. The woods are burning on the Southern Railroad between Toledo and Adrian, and on the Central Railroad near Dearborn. On the Pontiac Railroad it is raging so that the falling trees obstruct the passage of the trains. The city is so full of smoke that it is impossible to see across the streets. The fire is spreading toward Ann Arbor, destroying much valuable timber and property.

The Providence Post says: About three weeks ago, the wife of Mr. Henry Colvin, of Coventry, rose in the morning, complaining of a pain in her side. She soon after fell asleep, or died, as supposed. When her friends came to attend the funeral, they were struck with the remarkably lifelike appearance of the corpse, and the funeral was deferred. Since then, she has laid in the same condition, and many have visited Mr. Colvin's house, none of whom can discover any signs of decay. There had been no alteration on Friday, 21st, a period of about three weeks.

At Milwaukee, during Sunday night, Oct. 16, five alarms of fire were sounded—three of them false, supposed to be got up to weary the firemen—but the other two arose from conflagrations, the last of which occurred at a warehouse on Higby's Pier, which was filled with flour, beef, and merchandize, almost all of which was destroyed. The loss is estimated at nearly $50,000. Among the property destroyed were 4,000 barrels of flour, $2,000 worth of butter, and a large quantity of beef, pork and apples. It was the work of an incendiary, and a reward of $1,000 is offered by the Mayor for his apprehension.

An attempt has been made on the New York and New Haven Railroad to substitute coke for wood, as fuel for locomotives. It was found impossible to generate steam with sufficient rapidity by means of coke, causing the train to get "behind time;" and wood is now used as before. However, this result is not considered altogether decisive, as the firemen were ignorant of the proper mode of using the coke, and the trial will probably be repeated. Coke is used almost exclusively in England; and anthracite, on some of the roads in Pennsylvania, with success.

A gentleman brought an action recently in one of the Ohio courts, against the owners of a steamboat on which he had lost a trunk containing $2,000. The court held that they were bound to pay for the loss of ordinary baggage, but not for anything of unusual value, unless made known to them beforehand, so that they could take extra care, and charge an extra price for carrying it. Accordingly the jury brought in a verdict allowing him $300—the value of the trunk and the clothing in it—but disallowing the $2,000.

The Rock Island Advertiser gives the following warning: "We were shown, on Monday last, by the teller of the Rock Island Bank, three notes of the denomination of $50, altered, in a truly beautiful and scientific manner, from $3's; also, one of the denomination of $10, altered from a $2. There are, in addition to those, he informed us, $10's altered from $1's, in circulation. All that is necessary to remember about the notes of this Bank, to prevent being deceived by these alternations, is, that no bills of a higher denomination than $5's are issued by it.

The Directors of the Utica and Binghamton Railroad have issued a notice announcing their determination to take no immediate steps toward the construction of that Road. They declare that when $800,000 shall have been subscribed they will put an Engineer upon the route and commence the grading of the road. They express great confidence in the feasibility, &c., of the project, but think the present subscriptions do not warrant the taking of active steps.

The market for wool is very dull every where, and appears to be gradually growing more and more depressed. Prices are generally five to eight cents lower than when the clip was first brought into market. The fear that this decline will continue is so great, that large holders are offering it at reduced prices on long time.

The steamer Keystone State, of the Dunkirk and Detroit line, collapsed her flue on Saturday on the Detroit River—badly, though not dangerously, scalding two firemen.

The Reformer, published in Trenton, N. J., says that the same Maine Law which was presented last year to the Legislature of New Jersey—with a petition signed by 60,000 persons—and defeated by traitors, will be presented to the Legislature at its next session, with a provisionary clause to submit it in a constitutional form to the vote of the people at a special election.

There is to be erected a noble monument to the memory of Henry Clay, in Kentucky, the State of his home and adoption. Two citizens of Ohio have each given $1,000; and in Fayette county, (his late residence,) $15,000 have been raised. Franklin and Bourbon counties have each subscribed about $8,000, and other counties in the State in proportion.

The catalogue of Harvard College, just issued by John Bartlett, Cambridge, gives an aggregate in that Institution of 700 students, of whom 329 are under-graduates, and 371 professional students and resident graduates. The officers of instruction and government comprise 41 persons, actually engaged in College duties. The expenses of an under-graduate for a year, included in the College bills, amount to $224.

The earnings of the Milwaukee and Mississippi railroad for the year ending August, 1853, were $138,928. Expenses, $50,445. Net earnings, $88,483. The earnings since August show an increase of more than 100 per cent.

DIED,

At Trivolia, Ill., Oct. 13th, of erysipelas in the face, James A. Dunham, aged 53 years. Brother Dunham became a subject of grece in early life, and joined the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Piscataway, N. J. Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U S, and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

Miscellaneous.

The Crystal Palace.

We are indebted to the Independent for the following description of the Crystal Palace and some of its contents. The references in describing the divisions are to Stewart's map of the Palace.

The Building.

The Palace is in the form of a square cross, four hundred feet each way. The machine arcade, on the eastern side, is four hundred and fifty feet long and twenty-two feet wide, over which is a second story, is the picture gallery, of the same dimensions, with skylights arranged to give the finest effects of light and shade to the pictures. There are twelve hundred gas burners arranged along a couple of parallel gas-pipes, which are used for lighting up this gallery in the evening, when the display is most brilliant and effective, far excelling any similar spectacle ever seen in this country. There are in the Palace over fifteen miles of gas pipe, and about five thousand burners, a larger number than in the streets of New York and Brooklyn together. The dome is [illegible] feet above the floor, resting on slender iron columns. It is one hundred feet in diameter at the base, and is composed of iron ribs [illegible]-one feet long on the outer curve, and covered with wood and tin, forming a hemisphere surmounted by a well-proportioned lantern. The topmost peak of the flag-staff is two hundred feet above the ground floor. The interior of the dome, 148 feet above the ground, is decorated in the most brilliant and tasteful manner, and when lighted up in the evening by a circle of one thousand burners placed at the base, presents the most gorgeous and fairy-like appearance imaginable. Nothing can be finer than the effect of the scene within the Palace as twilight comes on, throwing its shadowy mantle over the thousand forms of beauty wrought out by genius and skill, which are crowded within its capacious walls, and when sunlight is as by magic instantly succeeded by the glare of the gas illumination, which almost blinds the eye of the visitor with its sudden and intense brilliancy.

The Grand Divisions.

The ground floor of the main building is divided into four grand divisions, marked A, B, C, and D, and each grand division has twenty-nine courts, represented on the diagram map by Arabic numerals.

Division A is devoted exclusively to the contributions of our own country, and is the first named in the catalogue. Division B is appropriated to the contributions of Great Britain and Ireland, with a few American articles near the eastern side of the machine arcade, in court No. 28, where will be found several ingenious models of railroad bridges, and O'Neil's admirable model of an elevated railway, designed particularly for the relief of Broadway. Division C. is devoted to the contributions from Belgium, the German States, and France. Belgium occupies courts Nos. 1 and [illegible], where will be found specimens of arms, musical instruments, brushes, linens, and other articles well worthy of special note. The German States occupy courts Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, [illegible], 16, 17, and 22, where will be found a great variety of articles designed for use and ornament.

Division D is appropriated to Italy, Austria, Holland, the British Colonies, including Canada, Newfoundland, Prince Edward's Island, and British Guiana, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, [illegible], Turkey and Hayti; contributions from the United States will also be found in courts 3, 4, 10, 11, 16, 17, part of 21, 22, [illegible] as marked on Stuart's Map Guide of the Palace. These contributions consist of a splendid display of daguerreotypes, a fine representation of stationery in court No. 16, where will be found the admirable specimens of [illegible] colored printing invented by John [illegible], and contributed by Horace Greeley. The United States Government contributes [illegible] survey apparatus, and charts from the observatory at Washington, and the standard of weights and measures, which will be found in court No. 11, near the Superintendent's office. Some of this apparatus is equal to any ever constructed, in point of delicate precision and high finish.

Denmark occupies parts of courts Nos. 8, 13 and [illegible], with "Thorwaldsen's group of Christ and his Twelve Apsstles," a novel clock, and one other article. Italy occupies Nos. 6 and [illegible], where will be found many very rare and beautiful articles, including inlaid and mosaic tables, filagree work, marble statuary, &c., which will require hours for a thorough examination.

Canada, in court No. 2, has many characteristic articles, including various kinds of grain, Indian bead work, blankets, leather, cloths, maple sugar, and a very beautiful carpet, wrought by the ladies of Hamilton, in aid of funds to build a church in that place. The price is fixed at $300, and it is well worth the money. Newfoundland is represented by a large display of stuffed furred animals and birds peculiar to that region, which will be found in court No. 9. British Guiana sends a very large lot of specimens of the various valuable woods furnished by her soil, and other note-worthy contributions, which will be found in court No. 25.

Austria sends statuary, including three of the famous veiled heads, which will be found in courts Nos. 18, 19, 20; also, a splendid specimen of lead pipe, 1800 feet long, with numerous other interesting contributions. Holland contributes Japan ware and many characteristic articles. Hayti sends a huge block of mahogany, segars, and many other articles peculiar to the country, which will be found in court No. 29. The contributions from Sweden and Norway, Mexico and Turkey, are very limited in amount, and must await [illegible] notice.

Division A is much the completest part of the exhibition in point of variety and arrangement of articles. The government contributions of arms, in courts Nos. 1 and 2, are very fine. [illegible] these articles are the famous repeating rifles and pistols. In court No. 3 will be found the celebrated machine Brocatels, manufactured at Seymour, Conn., by machinery invented by Mr. A. R. Humerson, who deserves much credit for his perseverance in introducing this important branch of manufactures into the country. There is a fine display of carriages, piano fortes, cutlery, safes, chemicals, marbleized iron, California and other grains, &c., in this division, which will readily be found by reference to the guide map.

Division B contains Whitworth's tools, and machines for working iron, cotton machinery, articles of iron work, linen fabrics, cloths, old armor from the Tower of London, cutlery, embroidered hangings, and elegant stationery, from De Lorme & Co., which will be found in courts Nos. 1 and 7.

In court No. 6, division C, will be found the Gobelins and Bearnois tapestries, and the Sevres porcelains, all from the imperial manufactories of France, and sent out for exhibition by order of the Emperor, Louis Napoleon, whose portrait bust, with that of the Empress Eugenia, will be found in court No. 13; where also will be found some admirable porcelain ware. Under the dome will be found Baron Marochetti's equestrian statue of Washington, Powers' group, the serpent group, Kis's celebrated group of the Amazon, Columbus, King's celebrated bust of Webster, Carew's statue of Webster, and several other works of merit, also the Fresnel Light in the south nave. The statuary is arranged around the naves, and numbers over 300 pieces in all, the majority being from Italy. T. D. Jones, a promising American Sculptor, contributes busts of Generals Scott, Taylor, and Cass, also medallion portraits of Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, T. A. Richards, and Archbishop Hughes. In the machine arcade there are many novel and highly interesting contributions, which we shall not now describe. Agricultural and mineralogical departments we shall leave in the same predicament.

The picture gallery, on its catalogue of 675 pieces, contains many gems of art, among which a mother and child by Carlo Dolci, and the "Brigand and Horse" by an American artist, are very conspicuous pictures. The numbers commence in the center of the gallery, number one being the famous historic painting of Martin Luther before Charles the Fifth at the Diet of Worms. The whole exhibition is now complete, and whoever fails to visit it will be greatly the loser.

The Hungarian Regalia.

The official Temesvar Zeitung gives a particular account of the recent discovery of the royal insignia of Hungary, from which we draw the following sketch :—

"It was fully shown at the outset, by Auditor T. von Karger, that Kossuth first took the insignia to Alt-Orsova, but being unable, with any due degree of security, to conceal them there, he took them to the Hercules Baths at Mehadia. Finding, however, still less opportunity to hide them there, he returned forthwith to Alt-Orsova, placed them in the house of a certain George Theodor, and finally, by the assistance of trustworthy persons, forwarded them at night across the Cserna toward the Wallachian boundary, on horses bought for the purpose. It was also rendered certain, that companions of Kossuth had purchased on the same day, at Alt-Orsova, tools for digging, and had at night left for the Cserna. The winter on the lower Danube having come on very early, and covered the earth with snow a foot in depth, no search could be made for some months in the ground about Alt-Orsova, and when, in April, 1850, the snow and ice melted, all traces of any excavation had disappeared, and further research in this quarter was prevented, and the attention of those engaged in it turned to another part of the kingdom, by the shrewdness of the Kossuth party, who secretly removed the private marks and signals to a different place.

"Early last spring Karger was ordered to devote himself to the task of seeking the chest in which the insignia was deposited. He started on the principle that the secret could have been imparted to but few persons, in order to attain to any degree of security, and that they must have chosen some point, which could be easily found again by them or by their messengers, even upon the lapse of years; and further, that they could have crossed the Cserna by only one way, and that the place of concealment must be beyond that river—a region affording but few places suited to their object. Although a pretty thorough knowledge of the surface of this territory had been gained previously, a most thorough and careful examination was once more begun. This lasted several months, in all weathers, and even throughout the clear moonlight nights of July and August. Every upturned clod, every bush, tree, broken branch, stone, rut or scratch in the earth, was noted, the same spots were passed over and over again by those engaged in the search, sometimes in one direction, sometimes in another, now leaving the spot in despair of finding the clue, and yet, as if called back by some higher power—says the Austrian writer—returning again to the search. The result of all this research was the conviction, that the tokens of the place of concealment must be found in some peculiar conformation of the earth or hills, or in some peculiar tree or trees.

"Karger concluded finally that the desired sign must be sought among the trees. Now began anew a careful examination of the entire wooded district, and at last, in a solitary spot, almost hidden from the eye, and not far from an old road, untraveled for the last fifteen years, which once led to Wallachia, was noticed a clump of trees in which many branches had been lopped off or partially cut, and which on the whole presented somewhat the appearance of having been trimmed with some special object in view. Next it was noticed that branches found entangled in the thorns, bushes, and in the branches of other trees, belonged to the trees in the clump, which showed that those could not have been trimmed by the peasantry for fuel. In process of these examinations an elegant watch-key was found, and an ax handle, which indicated that a man of the better classes had assisted in the work. This, taken in connection with the light and friable soil, the peculiar position of the trees, completely covered with creeping plants, the solitary position of the place, and yet its proximity to the Danube on the one hand and the Turkish-Servitan boundary on the other, awakened in Karger's mind a feeling of the highest confidence that the place was found. He had been instructed not to begin the work of removing the earth until he had unmistakable signs of having found the right place; but he was now so sure that on the 6th of September last a space of twenty square fathoms was marked out, and men set to work examining it by digging ditches at intervals of a foot and a half, which were to be extended in each direction across the gore enclosed here in the bend of the river Allion, on which the clump of trees stood. On the 8th of September, at 8¼ o'clock in the morning, a man at work in the prolongation of the second ditch struck something which gave a metalic ring, and a moment later a well-locked iron box was exposed, taken to a place of safety, opened by force—and the Austrian tyrant had once more the Crown of St. Stephen in his possession.

New Inventions—Paper and Printing Press.

In the review of the Exhibition of paper at the Crystal Palace, is a notice of a new discovery which promises to work a revolution in the production of newspapers as well as of books. We refer to the straw paper of Mr. Mellier, a French chemist and manufacturer. This article is made entirely from straw, and, as we can testify, after a careful examination of specimens of various qualities, is as good as can be made of rags. By a new chemical process, the invention reduces the fibre of straw or other vegetable substances into pulp, which, we believe, is then finished as paper by the ordinary methods. The advantage of the use of straw comes from its exceeding cheapness and abundance. Rags are scarce, and as the demand for paper increases, become dearer; but there is little danger of a short supply of straw. To discover a way of using it for paper has long been desiderated, but until Mr. Mellier, no seeker had found it out. We are informed that his process is simple and cheap, and that when he ceases to claim compensation as patentee for its use, the price of paper cannot but fall very considerably.

Another invention of a character no less interesting and important to the publishers of journals of a large circulation, has been patented by Mr. Victor Beaumont, a citizen of New York, though of French birth. It is a printing press, which, at a moderate rate of speed, will deliver thirty thousand sheets printed on both sides in a single hour! Its movement combines the original principles of Napier, which are applied by Hoe in his great press, with some new and beautifully simple arrangements and devices of the inventor. It has a large central cylinder like the Hoe press, on which are fastened the forms for both sides of the sheet to be printed. The type are held fast by Hoe's patent column-rules. The paper used is a continuous strip or band, dispensing with men to feed the separate sheets, as in other power presses. This strip or band Mr. Beaumont arranges very ingeniously; he avoids the inconveniences inseparable from having it in the form of a roll, by laying it in a pile, folded backward and forward like a piece of broadcloth; one end of this pile is put into the press, which then draws in its own supply without tearing or straining the paper till the whole sheet has passed through. As there are no feeders, room is obtained for additional printing cylinders; a moderate-sized press will have twelve of these, and will require three hands to run it, two of them being employed in carrying and looking after the paper. Each twelve-cylinder press will work four of these continuous sheets at a time, or one to each three of its cylinders. Each sheet will pass twice through; at its first passage one of its sides will be entirely printed, the forms of the newspaper being impressed on it alternately. As it comes out, the machine lays it back again in the same sort of a pile, so that when it is all done, the attendant supplies its place with a fresh pile, and then carries it to the proper spot for it to be taken up and passed through the second time, which prints the side left blank before. Then the mechanism passes it along to the knives which cut the sheets apart, while another contrivance puts them in neat piles ready for the carriers. These knives are very ingenious. A serious difficulty has been experienced in other machines designed to print a continuous sheet, from the fact that an ordinary knife cannot be relied on to cut paper which is wet enough for printing. This inconvenience Mr. Beaumont obviates by making his serrated or saw-shaped knives with long and acute teeth. The points of the teeth easily pierce the paper, and once having obtained an entrance, the cutting is completed in an instant. [Trib.

A Few Hints on the Planting of Ornamental Trees.

Now that the autumn is already here, and will soon claim our admiration by the varied and brilliant tints which she throws over woodland and forest, reminding all who possess town or country residences, of the season of ornamenting their grounds, or the avenues in front of their dwellings, we may embrace this opportunity to offer a few hints to young planters, and those who are inexperienced in such work, upon the proper mode of performing these operations, in order to guard them against the popular notions which prevail in this matter.

1. The Selection of the Trees.—Care should be taken in the selection of trees. As a general rule, they should not be more than twelve feet high, and from that down to eight. Of course, if great pains are taken, and fine trees can be fonnd, they may be removed of a much larger size, though the risk of success increases. But it must be recollected, that the trees must be from cultivated ground. As recourse must be had generally to the nurserymen, it should also be borne in mind that trees growing in nursery rows are more or less injured every year that they stand there after ten or twelve feet high; they begin to lose their lower branches, and their fine spreading form; soon spindle up, and, in fine, become almost unfit for removal to open, exposed situations. If trees have been allowed full room to extend their branches, then larger ones would succeed better; but they can rarely be found.

Different formed trees are required for different situations; but in all cases select a rather low-branched tree, even for a street, as one that has been denuded of its side branches, while young, always suffers by the act, and continues a top-heavy tree. It is easy to prune off all such as are in the way at the time of setting out, if the tree is for the street; and if not, they should never be removed. For a park or pleasure-ground, the nearer they branch to the root the better. Do not allow the pruning mania to attack you, nor listen to those who would endeavor to persuade you that you have no taste in such matters as the choice of a handsome tree. Some people would not know a tree from a bush unless it was pruned up like a barber's pole.

2. The Manner of Planting.—Everybody knows, at least they think they do, how to plant an ornamental tree; consequently our advice may be gratuitous. Notwithstanding this, all may not know how to do the work in the best manner; and we write for the inexperienced, not the professional man.

The tree is not a post, and will require room, not only for the roots which it already has, but for those which are to grow. If there is much planting to do, and a gardener can be had, he should be called in; but if only a few, and the proper man is not to be found, the inexperienced must proceed with the work. When streets are made, all the loam is generally carted off, and little is left except the hard gravel, sand, or clay. Of course a tree will not thrive much in either of these. When trees are to be planted in such places, a large hole, six feet in diameter, should be dug, and eighteen inches deep; and to fill in around the roots, at least two-thirds as much good common earth should be procured as was thrown out, the other third being filled in at the surface from the best of that which was thrown out, unless clay. For want of such good soil, hundreds of trees die before the end of the second year. Fill in the earth so as to leave no crevices among the roots, and finish the operation by gently treading the surface.

3. After-Treatment.—The trees may be good, and the planting well done, but their growth will be just in proportion to their subsequent care or neglect. Generally they are left to take care of themselves. But this should not be. Every spring they should have the surface soil well dug, (unless in a paved street,) for a space of two or more feet all round the tree, and this space should be kept stirred two or three times during the first and second seasons at least—if longer the better. They may also have some good manure dug in, if it is convenient. For the want of such care, the surface of the ground becomes hard, and almost impervious to water, or is choked up with grass and weeds, which drink up all the moisture that should go to the roots of the trees.

Shoeing Horses.

The following are the regulations of the British army upon this subject. They were prepared by a mixed commission of officers and eminent experienced professional men, and have recently been issued :—

"1. The shoe is to be beveled off so as to leave a space and prevent pressure to the sole.

2. It is not to be grooved or fettered, but simply punched, and the nails counter-sunk.

3. Calking is to be applied to the hind shoe only, and is to be confined to the outside heel. The inside heel is to be thickened in proportion.

4. The weight of the shoe is to be from twelve to fifteen ounces, according to the size of the horse.

5. Horses are to be shod with not less than six nails in the fore, and seven in the hind shoe; nor is the shoe to be attached with less than three nails in each side.

6. In preparing the foot for the shoe, as little as possible should be pared out; and the operation should be confined to the exfoliating parts of the foot only.

7. Both the fore and the hind shoes are to be made with a single clip of the toes."

These rules may be of some value to blacksmiths and horse-owners.

How to avoid a Bad Husband.

1. Never marry for wealth. A woman's life consisteth not in the things she possesseth.

2. Never marry a fop, or one who struts about dandy-like, in his silk gloves and ruffles, with silvered cane, and rings on his fingers. Beware! there is trap.

3. Never marry a niggard, a close-fisted mean, sordid wretch, who saves every penny, or spends it grudgingly. Take care lest he stint you to death.

4. Never marry a stranger, or one whose character is not known or tested. Some females jump right into the fire, with their eyes wide open.

5. Never marry a mope or drone, one who drawls and draggles through life, one foot after another, and lets things take their own course.

6. Never marry a man who treats his mother or sister unkindly or indifferently. Such treatment is a sure indication of a mean and wicked man.

7. Never, on any account, marry a gambler, a profane person, one who in the least speaks lightly of God or religion. Such a man can never make a good husband.

8. Never marry a sloven, a man who is negligent of his person or his dress, and is filthy in his habits. The external appearance is an index to the heart.

9. Shun the rake as a snake, a viper, a very demon.

10. Finally, never marry a man who is addicted to the use of ardent spirits. Depend upon it, you are better off alone, than you would be were you tied to a man whose breath is polluted, and whose vitals are being gnawed out by alcohol.

In the choice of a wife, take the obedient daughter of a good mother.

California Nomenclature.

Some of our people in the interior have a most extraordinary taste in nomenclature. The recent election has brought to light such delectable localities as Whiskey Creek, Jackass Gulch, Humbug City, One Horse Town, One Mule Town, Drunkard's Bar, Murderer's Bar, Shirt Tail Canon, Lower Humbug, Negro Hill, Fiddletown, Coon Hollow, Jay Hawk, Condemned Bar, Grizzly Flat, Musquito Canon, Poverty Bar, Mule Canon, Greenhorn, Mugginsville, Mad Muletown, Sucker Flat, Rattlesnake Bar, Yankee Jim's Peppermint Bar, Mad Canon, Humbug Canon, Rough and Ready, French Corral, etc. For the love of posterity, reform your nomenclature, good people, before it is too late. Unlike the settlers of most of the other States, our people have retained very few of the Indian names for localities. Most of the rivers and counties in the State, and many of the settlements south of Sacramento, are still known by the euphonious Spanish titles given them by the early Californians. They were a very devout people, and sprinkled the names of their favorite Saints all over the country. Thus we have San Francisco, San Joaquin, San Diego, Santa Clara, Canta Cruz, Santa Barbara, San Bernardino, Santa Ysabal, San Luis Obispo, San Andreas, San Jose, San Antonio, San Rafael, San Leandro, Santa Ynez, San Gabriel, San Miguel, and a whole calendar more of Sans and Santas. Of their unecclesiastical names, what more euphonious than Mendocini, Mariposa, Alameda, Nevada, Bolinas, Sacramento, Alviso, Salines, Sonoma, Sierra, Sancelito, Vallecito, Martinez, and Petaluma. Bending Ship Timber.—Thomas Blanchard, of New York, has invented a new method of bending or turning ship timber, which invention he has sold to a company lately organized with a capital stock of $600,000. The great steamship Wm. Norris, now being constructed, is being built of this timber as far as the company can at present afford a supply.

This invention of bending timber consists in compressing the stick longitudinally by an immense pressure of steam power just before bending, which secures elasticity to the timber. Timbers of any length and any form can thus be obtained, and a whole ship's sides can be built without a joint, which thus presents greater strength against shocks of waves, or collision with other bodies. Another important source of strength to articles made of this bent wood is, that it is made to present its surface against the grain or fibre. If a ship or any other object made of wood is struck in the direction of the grain of its timbers, it splits easily, but here the method is to bend the timber in a direction against the grain, so that timber bent under this patent is infinitely stronger than previous to the bending. New wood is preferable for this operation, or wood before the traces of age appear, weakening its fibre.

Almost all kinds of wood can be used for this purpose, thus equalizing to a great extent their value for ship building purposes.

London Life.

In a city like London, the strife of life is awful. All classes, who work in any way for their living, find it an unmistakable reality. There is no exemption. A man can not turn from one thing to another if the first experiment fail. Here failure in any thing is ruin, and ruin is disgrace. Nor can he work till he is wearied or disgusted, and then rest from his labors, till weariness or disgust has passed away. There is no rest, till he rests with a view of no return to toil; and this view comes only with satisfied accumulation, or with the grave. If a man in ordinary business, especially if he be a salaried man, having a good situation, turns aside but for a moment, he is lost. The stream of competition hurries past him, with its whirling eddies of intrigue, and he is left upon the shore. Out of sight for a moment is out of mind. Some greedy person, with his watchful eye, has stepped into his place, and he cannot regain it—or gain another like it. Especially, if he be past his prime, his case is hard, for how can timid age, with all its infirmities and antiquated notions, contend with the activity and audacity of youth? So long as a man, even if he be weak keeps in his treadmill, he is tolerably sure of support, whatever it may be, for they do not turn people adrift in England who have served with fidelity. But he must not leave his place, except on the most urgent necessity. And hence there is a sort of stereotyped character to ordinary people, a want of boldness of thinking, a regularity of life, which, desirable in most respects, still, in others, turns a man into a machine, or fits him only to bear burdens.

Embraced in Good Time.—The Memphis Appeal contains the following :—

"A most touching case, illustrative of conjugal love, occurred at our wharf a few days since. A man and his wife were coming up the river, when the husband took sick and was supposed to have died. When they arrived at this place, the wife had a coffin purchased, and the husband was deposited in the last home of the dead. Just before the moment of the closing of the coffin, however, and the final interment of the deceased, the bereaved and agonized wife insisted on once more looking upon and embracing the cold remains of the deceased partner of her bosom. Whether it was her warm embrace or returning consciousness, certain it is, that the supposed corpse suddenly evinced signs of life, and the proper restoratives being applied, within twenty-four hours the invalid was enabled to proceed on his journey, owing his life to the untiring devotion and love of his true and faithful wife."

VARIETY.

There was a problem among the Stoics, which ran thus :—"When a man says 'I lie,' does he lie, or does he not? If he lies, he speaks the truth; if he speaks the truth, he lies." Many were the profound works written on this wonderful problem. Chrysippus favored the world with no less than six; and Philetus studied himself to death in his vain attempts to solve it.

"Did he not make several visits after the patient was out of danger?" was the question of a lawyer in cross-examining a witness called to prove a doctor's bill, in one of our justice's courts, a couple of days since. "No," replied the witness, "I thought the patient was in danger as long as the doctor continued his visits."

A gentleman at a musical party, where the lady was particular not to have the sweet sounds interrupted, was freezing during the singing of a long concert piece, and asked a friend, in a whisper, "how he should stir the fire without interrupting the music?" "Between the bars," replied the friend.

There is a set of harmless liars, frequently to be met with in company, who deal much in the marvelous. Their usual intention is to please and entertain; but as men are most delighted with what they conceive to be the truth, these people mistake the means of pleasing, and incur universal blame.

When Sir William Hamilton announced to the Royal Irish Academy his discovery of the central sun—the star around which our orb of day and his planetary attendants revolve—a waggish member exclaimed, "What! our sun's sun? why, that must be a grand sun!"

If two negatives are equivalent to an affirmative, what inference can we draw from the following :—"Nobody that don't take that man for no great thing aint much mistaken?" This is a veritable sentence in a communication from a correspondent.

In a recent 4th of July oration at Oswego, a young orator waxed sublimely eloquent in descanting on the "frigate" of Columbus, and the "stars and stripes" that waved from his mast head.

The celebrated English poetess, Eliza Cook, very truly says, "To appreciate the value of newspapers, we have only to suppose that they were to be totally discontinued for a month."

When a man finds a great deal of fault with a newspaper which he never fails to read, it is a sign he has not paid for it. People seldom pick flaws in their own property.

A team recently made its appearance at Stockton, California, with a load of snow, four days from the Sierra Nevada mountains. It was sold at twenty cents a pound.

The original Robespierre guillotine—the machine, framework, knife and basket—was sold at auction a few days ago, in Paris, for fifty francs, and burnt directly afterwards.

An elderly lady died almost instantly, a few days since, at Palmyra, Mo., from the sting of a hornet inflicted on the wrist.

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

Continued from the Recorder of Oct. 27.

Israel, however, rebelled still. They yet walked not in the statutes of their God. He complains that they despised His judgments and "greatly polluted" His Sabbaths. Long-suffering, He spared them still, but gave over to death the more rebellious in the wilderness. In like manner, reminding the succeeding generation of the tokens of His goodness and grace, He likewise counseled them to obedience—and with similar results. He renewed His commands, and again intimated His gift of the neglected blessing: "Walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them; and hallow my Sabbaths; and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am the Lord your God." But this generation also walked not in the statutes of their God, nor kept his judgments; His Sabbaths they "greatly polluted," and their eyes were after their fathers' idols, so that the Lord now threatened that He would "scatter them among the heathen, and disperse them through the countries." Ver. 13—24.

Having so despised their mercies, God gave them over to the dominion of their corrupt propensities, in order that they might prove the fruit of their doings. "Wherefore, I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live; and I polluted them in their own gifts, in that they caused to pass through the fire all that openeth the womb, that I might make them desolate." But God's purpose, in thus leaving them to the bitter consequences of their iniquities, was a purpose of grace. There was no intention in the divine mind to break His covenant, and no unconcern about their return to Him, and to the enjoyment of true and permanent blessedness. On the contrary, God here expressly again declares, that all His adverse dealing was "to the end that they might know that I am the Lord." (Ver. 25, 26.)

The prophet is now directed to recount the iniquities of the successive generations of Israel, each following the sinful ways of their fathers, and committing all their abominations, until at length they resolve that they "will be as the heathen, as the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone." (Ver. 27—32.) This is the climax of their ungodliness; for, as it exhibits dire apostacy from the living and true God, so it is a willful breach of their covenant engagements, and tends altogether to defeat His gracious purpose in their separation as a people. Their apostacy shall then, therefore, be brought to an awful termination. With a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out, the Lord declares, He will now bring them out from the countries wherein they have been scattered, and that He will bring them into the wilderness of the people, and there plead with them "face to face," like as He pleaded with their fathers in the wilderness of Egypt, and that thus will He bring them "unto the bond of the covenant," purging out the rebels from among them. (Ver. 33—39.)

On this, the result of all God's dealings with His people of Israel, past and future, is founded a renewed expostulation, and assurance of ultimate obedience and acceptance: "For in mine holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord God, there shall all the house of Israel, all of them in the land, serve me. There will I accept them, and there will I require your offerings, and the first-fruits of your oblations, with all your holy things. I will accept you with your sweet savor, when I bring you out from the people, and gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered, and I will be sanctified in you before the heathen. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall bring you into the land of Israel, into the land for the which I lifted up mine hand to give it to your fathers." (Ver. 40—42.) This, then, is the issue of the long suffering and tender mercy of the Lord towards the people of Israel. Their wanderings and rebellion cease together. Having been gathered out of the countries of their dispersion and oppression, and being afterwards purified in the furnace of affliction, they shall again be planted in their own land, "the land of Israel," and in God's "holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel," shall they truly serve Him.

The futurity of the events to which the prophet thus points, is evident. The promise relates not to Judah merely, but to "all the house of Israel, all of them in the land;" a promise which, as regards the Ten Tribes, has not had even the shadow of fulfillment. Equally is the contrition expressive of their future condition of heart, although thus rendered certain. "And there shall ye remember your ways, and all your doings, wherein ye have been defiled; and ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight for all your evils that ye have committed." (Ver. 43.) Now, it is important to notice, that again, in "the land of Immanuel," and in God's "holy mountain," He promised to "accept," yea, to "require" their offerings, the first-fruits of their oblations, and all their holy things. Brought again under the bond of the covenant, all that covenant embraces will be truly performed—the Sabbath of Paradise, which was introduced into that covenant, be therefore truly kept holy, and as we are thus assured, be accepted of the Lord. Its profanation has a prominent place in the divine complaint of their transgression; and now, when confessedly the ground of that complaint shall have ceased, and when their services shall be pleasant, as in the days of old, God's holy day shall be duly remembered and honored, with other appointments divinely prescribed unto them.

Again, we have in a prophecy by Isaiah the same connection between Israel's present sin and the anticipation of their future obedience and Millennial blessing—blending still Sabbath observance with their highest hopes and brightest prospects. The prediction opens with a loud call by the Lord to show the house of Jacob their sin. Their hypocrisy and perversion of the appointed feasts is set before them, and the real nature of those ordinances is exhibited. To their rightful observance, exalted spiritual privileges are promised; and, pointing forward prophetically to the time when his people shall build again their old waste places, and "raise up the foundations of many generations," the prophet, in the name of his Master, declares, "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on My holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, and honorable; and shalt honor Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride with the high places of the earth, and feed thee upon the heritage of Jacob thy father; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Is. lviii. 12—14. The descriptive title here given to Israel, as "the Repairer of the Breach, the Restorer of paths to dwell in;" and the assurance that they shall build the old waste places, and raise up the foundations of many generations, clearly points to the period of their restoration, when their light shall rise in obscurity, and their darkness as noonday. It is in Millennial times, and not before, that the Outcasts shall receive the heritage of Jacob, and delight themselves in the Lord. The prediction, therefore, plainly refers to a time of spiritual enjoyment and national prosperity, such as has not since been attained, but of which other prophecies, as we have seen, also give ample assurance. Even Dr. Dwight remarks, "It is a prediction to the Jews, that if they will perform these duties, God will greatly prosper them with spiritual and temporal blessing, in the land of their fathers;" adding, indeed, "In my own opinion, it especially respects a period yet to come." Thus, then, again does God connect the exhortation to the discharge of present duty with the prospects of future blessing. And while other duties are also specified, and other promises made, it is surely note-worthy, how much importance is here again attached to the faithful observance of God's Sabbath, and the connection in which its due remembrance stands with Israel's future prosperity and blessed dominion, when they "shall ride upon the high places of the earth." It is when they shall "call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable," that all here promised is to be realized, and when, consequently, the Sabbath itself shall have its approved place in that Millennial day. That the Sabbath here spoken of is the same that is every where throughout the Word of God so designated, is sufficiently evident. Addressed as these words are to the children of Israel, "the Sabbath day could only be regarded by them as the day which is so termed by Moses, by the prophets, and by the Apostles. To us, therefore, it is surely instructive, in such a connection, to hear God, when the promised Times of Refreshing shall have come, still designating the Sabbath, as before, "My holy day."

"I KNOW NOT THE MAN."

When I was about seventeen years of age, my mind was specially aroused to think of things belonging to my everlasting peace. It was the work of the Holy Spirit. I have never been able to recall any other means of my awakening. I had occasionally before some anxiety; though nothing deep or permanent. I was in great distress for days; and finally promised myself, and my God too, that I would be a Christian. My mind was so much impressed with my obligations, that I urged duty upon my room-mate, a lad two years my junior.

At that time I was attending a large public school, and was a leader in the vanities usual at such places. When I resolved to serve the Lord, I felt that it would be inconsistent to continue my former practices—consequently I withdrew from the play-ground. This withdrawal necessarily excited notice, and called forth inquiries about the cause. Some feared I was sick. To all their inquiries I returned evasive answers. But my room-mate disclosed the whole matter.

I then became the object of incessant jeers and solicitations. Every kind of abuse was heaped upon me; I had not moral courage to stem the torrent, and the result was, that I denied my promises and resolutions. Like Peter, I declared, "I know not the man." Soon, I rushed more madly than ever into the vortex of sin. The Spirit of God left me for years, and I became exceedingly hardened. I indulged in wickedness, at which I should have shuddered before I was awakened to a sense of my sinfulness and need of interest in the great salvation. I now look back with horror at the scenes through which I then passed, and with wonder that God did not destroy me.

REFLECTIONS.

1. The unrenewed heart is opposed to Christianity. I was kind to my fellows, but that did not satisfy. I must not leave them to serve the Lord.

2. Mere resolutions do not constitute regeneration. Nothing but the love and fear of God—love and fear implanted and cherished by divine grace—can sustain the soul, against the opposition of the wicked. Had I really rested on a divine arm, I should not have fallen.

3. To deny Christ is perilous. I did it, and the Spirit left me for a long season to hardness of heart and blindness of mind.

4. This sketch may admonish young Christians to stand firm—resting their all on God. Let such see to it, that they are willing to endure reproach for Christ's sake. [Evang.

DAYS IN THE FURNACE.

In the fall of 1845, I entered the Theological Seminary, and began my more immediate preparation for the preaching of the gospel. College life had brought a cloud over my piety, and relaxed the sternness of my consecration to the work. I had nothing before me but an undefined view of some pious New England parish, where sympathy and love would make labor easy.

A pious lady one day asked me if I had thought of the question of personal duty to the heathen; she said no more, but the question clung to me; I tried to dismiss the unwelcome subject, but it returned again and again; I was unhappy; conscience reproached me for avoiding the question. I excused myself. "The question is preposterous; I am not fit for a missionary; my talents are insufficient; I cannot learn a foreign language; my health is not good; my parents will not consent; 'there are heathen enough at home.' I am wanted here." But these things did not satisfy conscience; she told me that they were excuses, not arguments; that this was no fair and manly confronting of the question of duty, but avoiding it with a one-sided argument, not intended to elicit truth, but to reconcile duty and inclination. Still I avoided it, and the cloud between God and my soul grew darker; the Holy Spirit, grieved at my resistance, stood aloof; prayer lost its sweetness, for I could not find God.

Conscience told me more and more plainly that I ought to examine the question solemnly and fairly, look at it on both sides, decide it in the fear of God, and act accordingly. I then tried to appease her by promises:—"When I have a more convenient season," next vacation, or when I get through the seminary, I will consider it; what need of hurry? I have three years of study yet, time will throw light upon it, I will watch the leadings of Providence. "No," said conscience, "you have all the light you need; the heathen world with all its wants and woes lies before you, at least eight hundred millions ignorant of Christ, two or three thousand of them dying every hour without the knowledge of salvation provided." These and other like considerations God forced upon me in spite of myself; and they gradually decided the question for me, before I had consented to look at it! I saw more and more clearly, that if I should examine it candidly and conscientiously, there was little doubt which way the decision would be. This made me shun it the more; and as I did, my way grew darker and more thorny; I was fighting against God. But blessed be his holy name, that with God-like patience he continued to fight with me, and brought me at last to yield. I kept a day of fasting and prayer; I humbled myself before my God for my delay, and in view of the cross, consecrated myself in his strength to his service, wherever he might call me. The cloud departed and the Sun of Righteousness shone upon my soul. The question was now no tangled one: I looked at all the considerations on both sides; the path of duty was plain; the noon-day sun shone upon it; my objections seemed light as air, and I loathed myself that I had been swayed by them.

The day was one long to be remembered. I sat at the foot of the cross and looked up, with streaming eyes, to Him who hung upon it. "Lovest thou me?" Tears of shame and tears of love filled my eyes, as I said, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." Time was gone; eternity surrounded and enveloped me; I breathed it. I stood before the throne of God, and saw the dead come to judgment, and receive their award. The nations that forgot God were turned into hell; the shrieks of the lost came up from the bottomless pit; while from the other side came the songs of the blessed, and among them stood those who had turned many to righteousness, shining like the stars in the firmament; their Elder Brother smiled upon them. How contemptible now seemed ease and comfort; how light the cross; how pleasant trials and sorrows endured for Him, who loved us, and gave himself for us. I blessed God, and have never ceased to bless him, that he did not leave me to pursue my inclination. I shudder as I look back and think, What if God, wearied with my opposition, had given me up to my folly?

That day was to me a beginning of days, the first of a new life, a second conversion. The experience which preceded it was wonderfully similar to that which preceded my first submission to God; there was the same persevering work of the Spirit, the same resistance, the same excuses, the same procrastination, the same grieving of the Spirit and the same patience on his part, and the same final submission and consecration, and the same blessed results. Thence forward the candle of the Lord shone round about me, and the everlasting arms were underneath me. I never afterward had a single doubt of my duty to be a foreign missionary.

Remark.—The path of duty is the only path of happiness. All the "goodness which the Lord hath laid up for them that fear him," is strown along that path; all the flowers, which he has appointed to gladden our way, grow beside it, and wells of living water spring up all along it; while the way of selfish inclination leads through the wilderness and solitary way; it is barren as the desert; owls hoot by it, and the wild beast has his lair there. IMPROMPTU,

On seeing the question in the papers, whether a monument should be reared to the little martyr, who died rather than violate his conscience. The facts were these: A little boy, about ten years old, named Knud Iverson, of Chicago, Ill., was assailed by a company of larger boys, who endeavored to force him, by threats of drowning him in the river, to go into the garden of Mr. Ellston, to steal fruit for them. The lad refused, and continued his refusal in spite of their threats, until they plunged him into the river, and ran off, and left him to die, in spite of his earnest entreaties. [Pur. Rec.

Rear him a monument! such as for heroes,
Of sculptured marble, in some old cathedral
Stands, tall and pale, beneath the solemn arches,
Telling the stranger of a grateful nation!
Died he not bravely, though no trump and bugle
Stirred the young throbbings of that faithful spirit?
"The die is cast!" He passed through floods to glory!
Have we no tribute for this younger Cæsar?
Then lift the marble o'er him, that our children
May read his story, emulate his virtues,
May early learn the great immortal lesson
Of choosing death, before a life ignoble.

Rear him a monument, such as for martyrs,
We see on some lone hill-top, where the faggot
Forgot its torture, in its lofty mission—
Brought down the fiery chariot of Heaven!
Died they for truth, religion, happy martyrs?
KNUD IVERSON! thy name sounds well among them.
God and bright angels heard thy low death-gurgle—
"Just men made perfect" from the heavenly portals,
With songs of welcome, hail thee as their fellow!

Lover of little children, condescending Jesus!
If thine heart yearneth towards the young and tender,
Whose brows yet bear not the marks of time and trial,
How now thou glowest with divine affection
For him who early tasted of thy sufferings!

Let not the parents mourn their sweetest blossom,
Thus torn by ruffians in its morning promise;
In the most hallowed recess of Christ's bosom
There's room for him—the saint, the hero, martyr;
There persecution never can assail him,
And the lost child shall nestle there forever!

THE MAN WHO STEALS PREACHING.

He is a constant attendant at our church, and sits across the aisle from me. He does not look like a thief. He comes to meeting in his carriage—drives his sleek, high-spirited horse in showy style up to the door, and hands out his wife and daughters in a very gallant manner. He recognizes his neighbors and acquaintances without the least embarrassment—shakes hands with them, and chats about the weather and crops in an easy, self-important way, just as though he had never done a mean thing in his life. Look at him now, as he stands discussing the election returns with Esq. G——. Witness his self-complacent way of saying that his party, though defeated, is composed of honorable men, who have come out of the contest with their integrity unsullied; which is more than their opponents can say. Would you think that man would steal a sheep? No. But he does a meaner thing every Sabbath. He steals his preaching.

He [illegible] has a fine farm well stocked—raises the best corn, and has the finest orchard in town. His oxen took the first premium at the last cattle show, and his colts are famous, far and near, for their beauty. His house is neat and costly—his parlors are elegantly furnished, and his tables are always set with an abundance. His wife is a notable housekeeper, and his daughters are fashionably educated. But he steals his preaching.

He is a man of influence in our town. He has been our representative in the legislature several times—is one of our "select men" now. He frequently receives documents from Washington franked by our M. C. He is often chosen moderator of our town meetings, and his name is often seen on committee lists for one object or another. And whenever he makes a motion, or a speech, he is listened to with attention. But yet he steals his preaching.

He is a benevolent man; at least, he would be very angry if I should say he was not. He subscribed five dollars towards the New Orleans fund, and three or four years ago, did the same for the Irish fund. He once gave ten dollars to a Western college. When farmer H——'s house was burned, he also gave something for him; and his neighbors say that he has now and then given Widow B—— a load of pine wood. Once he subscribed fifteen dollars over and above his tax towards a new school-house in his district. Indeed, he rather prides himself on his public spirit, and always professes his willingness to do his part in all public enterprises. But yet he steals his preaching.

He is a man of good judgment; at least, that is what his neighbors say. And his thrift—the excellent condition of his farm and every thing pertaining to it, go to show that, as the world generally defines judgment, his is good. If an "eye to the main chance" is the mark of a strong, well balanced mind, his is such. And then the high consideration in which he is held by his fellow-townsmen leads me to think he does not make many mistakes in his public actions. Their confidence argues in him more than ordinary sagacity and discretion. But yet he steals his preaching.

He is an honest man—as the world defines honesty. He pays his debts punctually. His hired men all speak well of him. He never overworks them, and always gives them their wages according to agreement. His wood always holds out in measurement, and his cattle are always found equal to his warrant. He never beats down the merchant, and never offers to pay the doctor in produce. In short, he would be ready to "take the law" of me, and very likely a suit for slander would go against me, if I should say he was dishonest. But yet he steals his preaching.

And now why is this?—why should such a man be a thief? Because last summer our minister preached upon a doctrine which Captain C—— does not want to believe is taught in the Bible. The minister made out a pretty strong case in favor of the doctrine, and then pressed home with earnestness the corresponding duties of his hearers; and Captain C—— thought the most effective method of refuting his arguments would be to refuse his aid in supporting such a preacher. So this year, when the subscription paper was circulated, he declined signing it.

But yet he cannot do without preaching. Sunday would be insupportably dull if he staid at home. During the week he is busy on his farm, and Sunday offers a favorable opportunity of seeing his neighbors, learning the news, and getting his weekly papers. And besides, it is fashionable to go to meeting, and he would lose in the estimation of his townsmen if he absented himself entirely. And so, as there is no other church in town, he must continue to attend our meeting. This I do not so much wonder at. But I do wonder how he manages to do it with so much self-assurance. I wonder he does not come in softly, and sneak to a seat in the corner, and hide his face when the minister comes in. I wonder how he dares to speak to a single individual in the porch, and why he does not hasten away the moment the service ends, so as to avoid observation.

He acknowledges, that if it were not for the church and ecclesiastical society in town, his farm would not be worth more than half of what he now asks for it. He knows that his market in the village is worth double what it would be were there no moral restraints laid upon the inhabitants by the observance of the Sabbath. He knows that he sleeps quietly at night, undisturbed by any fears that his orchard or hen-roost may be robbed, or his building fired, because moral and religious instructions and restraints have made the community a law-abiding one. He knows that his chance of selling his farm, in case of necessity, is far better than it would be, were there no religious privileges in town. Indeed, two years ago, when he advertised his place for sale, he inserted a clause lauding the sobriety and morality of the neighborhood, as an inducement to purchasers.

And now I want to ask Captain C—— if such a course of conduct is honorable? I don't ask him if it is Christian, because he is not a professor of religion. But when he reaps so bountifully the fruits of Sabbath ordinances, and the public ministration of God's Word; is it manly, is it honest, for him to refuse all aid in maintaining them? Is it uncharitable in me to say, he steals his preaching! [Independent.

INTERESTING REVIVAL.

A few days since, in the midst of drought in nature, and with no outward indications of unusual religious feeling, a child ten years of age, living in the country, not far distant, one night called her mother to her bedside, and in deep distress begged her to talk with and pray for her, and asked why it had not been done before. The smitten young heart soon found peace in Christ, and in the morning began to tell her story of salvation. A devout female visited some families, and unburdened her spirit with expressions of solicitude and entreaty. Tears were the response, and a meeting was appointed in the school-bowed to the earth, beneath a sense of guilt and peril; and with no other means but such gatherings at the close of the day, the work is still progressing. Nearly fifty have indulged hope in Christ. The Christians engaged in this spiritual worship are nearly all Baptists; but humility, love and intelligent zeal seem to rule the laborers in the field.

The lessons impressively taught by this revival are the following:—

1. That the limitation of God to times or seasons, for displays of his saving grace, is absurd and wicked. Never, perhaps, did external appearances seem more unfavorable to the work of God. There were a few who professed godliness, but no special interest, while heat was scorching the land, and withered its increase.

2. That Jehovah often employs the simplest visible instrumentalities, to stain human pride, in carrying forward the victories of the cross "Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

3. The power of prayer is illustrated. There has been at least a wrestling Jacob. There was along with it, the faith of expectancy; and unknown to the busy and careless population, a watching of the moral horizon for the rising cloud before it darkened the heavens.

Oh! when the conditions of prayer are met by even a minority of the Church, and they are willing to use, without dictating at all to God the way he shall come, whether in a "protracted meeting," or in the ordinary means of grace, we shall see the windows of heaven opened above our desolate American Zion. THE PLAGUE OF RICHES.

In recently perusing Mrs. Torrey's "City and Country Life," we were much amused at the witty as well as truthful manner in which are depicted the cares, inconveniences and troubles which great wealth sometimes brings upon the possessors of it. We give our readers a short extract from the volume. Delia and Helen are the daughters of Mr. Edwards, a plain old farmer. Delia receives an ample fortune by the will of an uncle, the whole amount of which ($100,000) is paid into her hands in cash and checks, and by her carried home to her father's house.

"I shall feel a little scarey, I confess, to-night, with so much money in the house," said Mr. Edwards, getting up and putting on his hat. "I guess I'll go down to Shepard's, and see if I can't get a dog."

"But, father, I havn't much money, and the checks are good for nothing until I've endorsed them; so the money's safe enough."

"But folks may hear that your money has come, and think they can get at it, or try. I shall sleep better if I have a dog."

"What are you laughing at, Helen," said Delia.

"At my thoughts."

"A penny for them!"

"I don't sell as cheap as that to you; a great many people have had them gratis, and now I'm going to charge you enough to make it up."

"Then I'm bankrupt; for wisdom is above price. I can't pay for half your wise sayings, so you will have to keep this thought, or let it go cheap, on the ground that I'm poor, and belong to the favored class," said Delia.

"Your compliment pays amply for all past and present debts. Since you are pleased to call my nonsense wisdom, you shall have it free from all further expense. I was thinking what an elevating process it is to have a hundred thousand dollars in the house!—it brings intelligent beings, who have always lived fearless, and taken care of themselves, down to the necessity of depending upon a dog to take care of them!" said Helen.

"We lived fearless before, because we knew no one wanted us; it is the money now that is in danger, and not us; and according to your and Aunt Dorothy's opinions, money is more fit for dogs than men to keep," replied Delia.

"Yes, but our having the money endangers our persons; so we are dependent upon the dog, as well as the money."

THE MEETING OF THE WATERS.

Among the most tender and beautiful of the Irish Melodies, is that known as "The Meeting of the Waters." In the summer of 1807, Moore paid a visit to the vale of Avoca, in the County of Wicklow, where the two rivers, Avon and Avoca, meet—a most lovely and enchanting spot. This visit suggested the song which has associated the vale of Avoca with all that is charming and romantic.

There is not in this wide world a valley so sweet
As that vale in whose bosom the bright waters meet!
Oh! the last rays of feeling and life must depart
Ere the bloom of that valley shall fade from my heart.

Yet it was not that nature had shed o'er the scene
Her purest of crystal, and brightest of green;
'T was not her soft magic of streamlet or hill.
Oh! no, it was something more exquisite still.

'T was that friends, the beloved of my bosom, were near,
Who made every dear scene of enchantment more dear,
And who felt how the best charms of nature improve,
When we see them reflected from looks that we love.

Sweet vale of Avoca! how calm could I rest
In thy bosom of shade, with the friends I love best,
Where the storms which we feel in this cold world should cease,
And our hearts, like thy waters, be mingled in peace.

The vale of Avoca, thus made classic ground, thousands have since visited; and the tourist through Ireland would as soon think of neglecting the Lakes of Killarney as "the vale in whose bosom the bright waters meet."

AN EDUCATED MINISTRY.

In reading the October number of the Christian Review, (says a correspondent of the Watchman and Reflector,) I have been exceedingly refreshed with Dr. Sears' speech on "An Educated Ministry." And just at the present time, when the current of feeling is running so strong in the opposite direction, it seems to me that the following paragraph of that speech ought not to be shut up in any quarterly. It deserves to be read by every one; and as it holds on to the "old landmarks," I think it ought to call back the attention of some who may be too anxious for something better than a known and beaten track:—

Nor is the writing of Christian books necessarily a departure from the appropriate work of the preacher or missionary. That is a matter of expediency, depending entirely on circumstances. The printing-press was not known in the days of the Apostles. The difference between the spoken and the written word has been wonderfully changed. A man or woman that has the ability, may now speak through the myriad-mouthed press, and the whole civilized world gives audience. Heathen children may be taught to read; and then, a printed Bible, a Saint's Rest, a Pilgrim's Progress, may reach more persons than the oral discourses of a hundred preachers. If Apostles wrote as well as preached, when copies could be multiplied only by the slow process of handwriting, what would they have done, if they could have filled the whole Roman empire with religious books and tracts, as the world is now filled with daily papers! The Apostles did not send telegraphic dispatches, did not travel by railroads, any more than they taught modern science in colleges. Preaching, writing, and teaching are all to be used, both in Christian and in heathen lands, according to circumstances. No rule can be given on this subject, but that of adapting the means to the end. Thirty or forty years ago, there was scarcely an individual in all Burmah that believed in the existence of an eternal God. Now probably not less than two-thirds or three-fourths of all the people believe in one. What has effected this mighty revolution? The work of the missionary; not so much by oral preaching, as by books and schools. What is now shaking the old empire of China, so that it is as tottering as its walls? The work of the Christian scholar, who has, by his publications, as well as oral teachings, shed a light on the subject of God and nature, which the celestial kingdom can no longer resist. On this subject, our wisest and best missionaries, to which class our honored Judson belonged, testify in accordance with what I have said. They have always asked to be recruited with men who can reason, and expound the Christian religion, as well as exhort. What would have been the state of our missions, without our theological seminaries? Look over the list of those who have been engaged in the great work of evangelizing the heathen; go through the whole catalogue of American missionaries, who are not surpassed in efficiency by those of any other nation; and you will find that the theological seminary was almost literally the mother of them all. Let another set of men be shown, who have done equal service, before we abandon theological seminaries, for the sake of propagating the gospel more effectually.

"ALL IS FOR THE BEST."—Dr. Johnson used to say that a habit of looking at the best side of every event is better than a thousand pounds a year. Bishop Hall quaintly remarks, "for every bad there might be a worse, and when a man breaks his leg, let him be thankful that it was not his neck!" When Fenelon's library was on fire, "God be praised," he exclaimed, "that it is not the dwelling of some poor man!"

THE THEATER—UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.

Whether we shall succeed in saying any thing on this subject which will appear like sound doctrine to those who read, we do not know. Certainly, we have no wish to enter a caveat against amusements of every description, thereby inducing such austerity of character as is more befitting a funeral than the ordinary condition of society. There is "a time to laugh," and when that time is present, we do not w[illegible] friends, young or old, to wear sad countenances.

But we put it to those who fear God, whether they ought to seek their amusement in the vestibule of hell? In plain, unmistakable English, has a Christian any right to attend the theater? And in English just as plain and unmistakable, we answer, No. For, in the first place, he cannot go there without giving countenance to the dram-shop and the brothel, one or both of these abominations being connected with every theater in the land. And in the second place, he has no business to hire others to do for him that which he could not, conscientiously, and as a Christian, do himself. Lay thy hand upon thy heart, Christian, and say whether the business of playing on the stage is a business which you could conscientiously follow, and feel that in so doing you were glorifying God.

Now, if stage-playing is a business which the Christian cannot, and ought not, to follow, we argue that he has no right to hire others to follow it. Taking this principle for his guide, he may readily determine whether the Circus, the Hippodrome, the Race-course, the Juggler's Room, and many other places of a similar character, are suitable places for him to attend.

But a new era has arrived. Uncle Tom's Cabin, that world-renowned anti-slavery production of Mrs. Stowe, has been dramatized, and night after night its exciting scenes are presented on the stage. People that never visited the theater before, are found there now. Professors of religion, and even Christian ministers, (so we are told,) think it no sin to go now, that at once the place has become sanctified, and its performances are extolled as having the highest moral tendency. And though we have no proof that the managers are any more in love with good morals than they were before, it seems to be thought that they can preach through the drama, with as much effect as if they were, bona fide, the servants of righteousness. Under the plea that the sermon itself is good, all are going to see how skillfully a man can reprove sin. Indeed, the idea seems to be seriously entertained, [illegible] al reform most effectively.

Now, we do not believe, that a person is any more strongly impressed with the abominations of the slave system from witnessing the drama of Uncle Tom, than he is from reading the book. Let the healthful moral tendency of the former be what it may, it cannot exceed that of the latter. On this ground, therefore, the performance is useless. Consequently those who go to witness it, go not for the sake of the moral sentiment which it inspires, but for some other reason.

Nor can it be pleaded, that the book does not enchain the attention so as to convey to all classes of readers the sentiment it inculcates. No work of fiction was ever more fascinating. Those who begin to read it are unwilling to lay it aside till they have finished it. We do not believe that the drama can more powerfully rivet the attention, than does the simple tale as it stands in the book.

Neither can it be pretended, that there is some lack in the book—some failure to present the moral aspect of the question in its true light—which the drama makes up. No one has set up any such pretense, so far as we are informed. There is nothing original in the drama; it is but the book in a dramatic dress.

Why, then, do people go to witness it? Simply because they love the excitements of a theater; there is no other reason. And when we hear of Christians going to such a place, we are constrained to believe that their talk about the moral influence of the play, which they always set up in extenuation of their conduct, is but a mere excuse to cover up their fondness for theatrical excitements. We fear that they are such Christians as have habitually cherished a longing after such things, and are only glad that there is now a way open for them to gratify that longing to some extent, without too much outraging the moral sense of community. They may be disposed to repel this charge, for aught we know, but we are satisfied that if they will enter into a searching examination of their own hearts, they will see that such is the real motive which prompts them—a fondness for theatrical entertainments in general.

We are not a little anxious as to what will be the result of this Christian theater going. Uncle Tom will have had its day, and something else of a pretended moral tendency will be got up. Christians will be induced to witness that also, and the same pleas will be urged in justification. Those who desire to restrain their children from the theater, convinced that it is the highway to ruin—the very threshold of hell—will have to combat, not only the importunities of the children themselves, but the example of those Christians who thought it no harm to witness the performance of Uncle Tom. Already Christian parents are importuned, and their refusal is met with the plea, that there is no more evil in going to see Uncle Tom performed than there was in Elder B.'s going to the Bowery Theater to see the historical drama of "Putnam!" Verily, if Mrs. Stowe's book were justly responsible for such results, we could wish that it had never been written. T. B. B.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

GLASGOW. October 14th, 1853.

The telegraphic announcement, in anticipation of the Overland Mail, intimates the continued success of the Chinese patriots. Pekin is expected soon to fall, and with it the present dynasty. The intelligence from Turkey all seems more and more to imply that war is, in human estimation, inevitable. And if once commenced, when war is to end, the most skillful politicians confess themselves incapable of judging. With the word of God in our hands, and seeking to take heed to its sure word of prophecy, we fear that we are on the eve of "the greatest tribulation that ever was or shall be." War, famine, pestilence, and evil beasts, are God's four sore judgments, with which he threatens to avenge Himself upon the ungodly. Famine seemed for a time even now to threaten; and while war is imminent, pestilence, having been awfully fatal in other lands, is now in this country, and is creating no small apprehension, but is doing little to lead men to God. He is however crying, "Fear God, and give Him glory, for the hour of His judgments is come."

But with all the solemn awe which such prospects inspire, we are not without hope that these very judgments may lead many to feel more of the solemn reality that there is in the position which as Christians we occupy. Profession of the truth is made such an easy thing—comes so little in conflict with the world—yields so much to the world, and is in turn dealt liberally with by the world—that the light is little distinguishable from the darkness. God's ordinances are so little regarded, even by those in whom the fear of the Lord has really a place, that we may well wonder at the forbearing mercy of the Lord. When, however, the earthquake and pestilence and fearful sights from heaven proclaim the displeasure of a righteous God, we may hope the Church will lay more to heart the calling with which she is invested as the depository of divine truth, and the instrument for making it known in all its integrity to the ends of the earth. AGRICULTURE IN PALESTINE.

Mr. T. B. Stillman has handed us a letter from Mrs. C. S. Minor in Palestine to her son in this country, from which we copy a few paragraphs. The letter acknowledges the receipt of several boxes of clothing, tools, &c., one of which was "from Sabbath friends in New York and New Jersey." Mrs. Minor says:—

Our prospects for usefulness are now peculiarly encouraging. The disposition of the Jews generally, in Jerusalem and Jaffa, is most friendly, to us and our object. Our late persecutions and trials have proved to them our disinterested regard to them, and has excited their sympathy in our favor. Our laborers reside with us, having rooms in our house. They are industrious and dutiful, and much encouraged in their work by the taste of the first fruits of their labors recently gathered. They have many vistors, and delight in expressing their satisfaction to their brethren. Our large stone house, with large rooms and wide terraces, without one pane of glass in its 33 windows, is often full of Jews, who come and go, with their oriental manners and costume, in the kindest social harmony, without yet giving the first cause of offense, with fathers and mothers and children of three generations. Freedom and protection in the country are new things to them, and they esteem our friendship and neighborhood as a great blessing. There is but one congregation in Jaffa, of 70 families, superintended by a chief Rabbi, who acts as father and Judge of them all. He has resided here 20 years and is much esteemed by Turks and Christians. He visits us often, owns a garden, and is much interested in cultivation, and seeks to assist us in every way in his power. He has a large family, who, on account of the illness of his youngest child, and the present heat in town, have spent some time with us. You would have been pleased if you could have seen them, ten in number, sitting the first Sabbath eve around their extra evening meal—the Sabbath lamp hanging from the loaded vine branches above, they seated on mats on our highest terrace, overlooking the surrounding forest of orange and oriental fruits, and the blue sea spreading beyond, westward, with its solemn, ceaseless moan. At such moments I often think of you, my devoted child, and how much you have suffered in Artas, and how much you have sacrificed for this work, but now absent, and unable to witness what the love and grace of God have done in moving the hearts of this people so kindly towards us.

"The President of the Jews," as he is commonly called here, and all his family, seem much attached to us, and have offered rooms in their house in town for a school, and he desires that his people should engage generally in agriculture! What an opening for Christian love and sacrifice! The harvest truly is white, but where are the laborers, and the necessary means which the American Christian Church could so easily supply? Oh that God would arouse his people to feel for this long degraded, oppressed race, whose debtors they are. When shall our waiting hearts rejoice in such an hour? The best of land is for sale or lease all around us at a very low rate. Many Jews appeal for employment, but our poverty keeps us in narrow limits. Even the needful daily hospitality to the hungry visitor requires many brown loaves, and with the most severe economy, expenses increase with the increase of interest and sympathy in our work around us. Americans, I believe, have never resided in Jaffa, and we have many calls from the Turks, Arabs, and Christians—from the Cada, the principal Turk, the Pasha's Agent, and chief Sheiks, down to the poor village Arab 4 miles distant, who kisses the floor, begging Frank medicine for his sore eyes. So far we have found general favor in their sight, which is of the Lord's mercy, for we have no presents like our English neighbors to give to the great.

Our little farm is also often visited, and elicits much commendation. The American plants (Indian corn and sweet potatoes) now look very fine, and attract the most attention, while the young trees, bending with their various beautiful fruit, make it like a little Paradise. We commence work very early, rest through the middle of the day, and continue till after sunset. We are all at present in excellent health, delighted with our work, and constantly employed. Several excellent German families live near us, whose love for and object in coming to this land, is much the same as our own. They unite in social worship with us, and we have recently enjoyed much of the Divine blessing. They are humble and industrious, and seek to advance our work. We expect this fall that we shall be able to put in a good crop of wheat, which will be a great help in the article of bread. Our summer vegetables must be watered, but potatoes, beets, cabbage, cauliflower, etc., grow well in the autumn, winter and spring, without. Water in abundance is obtained here at a short depth from the surface, and is raised into reservoirs by very clumsy machinery, an Arab invention, expensive and tedious. If we had good chain pumps to introduce here, it would be a great improvement, and be one of the best means of extending agriculture.

OUR PALESTINE MISSION.

Brother Wm. M. Jones and wife, with Bro. Charles Saunders and wife, have been appointed by the Missionary Board to conduct the Seventh-day Baptist Mission in Palestine, and by a resolution of the Board are directed to proceed to the field of their labors as soon as practicable. It is therefore probable, that they will sail by the first vessel, say in a month or six weeks from this time. A Committee to attend to their outfit was appointed, consisting of A. D. Titsworth, of Plainfield, N. J., H. H. Baker, of New Market, N. J., and T. B. Stillman, of New York. They will therefore attend to the procuring of stores, tools, clothing, &c., for the Mission. The friends of the Mission, who wish to contribute articles of clothing, agricultural implements, tools, seeds, &c., are requested to inform either of the members of the Committee, that arrangements may be made to forward them to their destination at the earliest period.

The following resolution of the Board was passed at the meeting held Oct. 27th:—

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Board, that Bro. Charles Saunders and family proceed to Palestine, if practicable, with Bro. Jones, and that his duties be especially to take charge of the Agricultural or Industrial Department, and also, with Bro. Jones, to have charge of the finances, and to coöperate with him in all the practical duties which the Mission contemplates.

It will by this be seen, that the division of labor to which Bro. Saunders is devoted is that which will place him in a position well calculated to represent the private members of our American Churches. Our brethren who are acquainted with brother or sister Saunders will feel gratified with their appointment, and will doubtless engage with alacrity in the needful exertions to procure the proper outfit. THE COMMITTEE.

THE OHIO ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Ohio Association convened, according to adjournment, with the Church in Jackson, on Fifth-day, October 6, 1853, at 10 o'clock A M.

In the absence of the person appointed to preach the Introductory Discourse, Elder Thomas E. Babcock performed that duty, preaching from Luke 12: 32.

After sermon, the Association was called to order by the Secretary, the Moderator not being present. A committee was appointed to nominate Officers, and the Association then adjourned to meet at 3 o'clock P. M.

Met pursuant to adjournment. After prayer, the committee on nominations made their report, which was received and adopted as follows:—CALVIN DAVIS, Moderator; BENJAMIN CLEMENT and JOHN P. FORSYTHE, Secretaries.

The Letters from the Churches were then called for and presented, from which the following statistics were taken.

Jackson—Simeon Babcock, Pastor; Maxson Babcock and Benjamin Clement, Licentiates; John Forsythe and J. G. Babcock, Deacons; J. G. Maxson, Clerk. Added 25, deceased 1, total 86

Stokes—William Furrow, Deacon; Job Kennedy, Clerk. Added 5, total 30.

Communications from other bodies were then called for, and Elder T. E. Babcock presented the Minutes of the late Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, from which he read the Corresponding Letter and the Report of the Executive Board, and gave a summary view of the missionary labors of that body, together with the present prospects of the work. He also read the resolution by which he was appointed a delegate to this Association. Whereupon, it was resolved, that he be welcomed to a seat.

The Standing Committees were then appointed; after which the Association adjourned to meet on Sixth-day morning, at 9 o'clock.

Met according to adjournment. Annual Reports being called for, the Executive Committee made their report, which was received and adopted; from which the fact is taken, that Elder Joshua Hill has been laboring under their direction in the bounds of the Association since the 1st of July.

Reports of Standing Committees being called for, the Committee on the State of Religion reported as follows, which was received and adopted:—

Your Committee, after an examination of the letters from the Churches, feel gratified to find so good a state of feeling existing among us. It will undoubtedly be gratifying to all to learn, that instead of strife, discord and contention, invading our borders, the Spirit of God has been in our midst, and the dark clouds which have seemed to hover over us have been dispelled, backsliders have been reclaimed, sinners have been converted, and the churches built up. Though the churches have labored for some time past under a series of difficulties truly embarrassing, and clouds of darkness threatening impending ruin appeared gathering in the horizon, and many seemed to feel that the Lord had almost forsaken us, yet, when sufficiently humbled, the Lord was gracious; the sun of righteousness arose with healing on his wings; those portending clouds were dispersed, our prayers were heard and answered, and many were enabled to say, Blessed be the name of the Lord. Yet we feel that there is still great need of a deeper work of grace, of prayer, and watchfulness; in short, there is still a want of vital piety and of zealous devotedness on the part of the older numbers of the churches. Holiness and true piety are the standard set up by our Saviour, and nothing short of this will satisfy the soul hungering and thirsting after righteousness. Let us continue to press forward toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

The Committee on Resolutions reported, which report was received, and made the business of the afternoon session.

On motion, it was voted, that when we do adjourn, we adjourn to meet with the church in Jackson, on Fifth-day before the second Sabbath in October, 1854, at 10 o'clock; that brother Clement be appointed to preach the opening discourse, and Elder Hill alternate.

In the afternoon, the Report of the Committee on Resolutions was taken up, discussed, and adopted, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, in our opinion, holds a very important place among the interests of the denomination, and that we commend its publications to the confidence of the people of this Association, and earnestly recommend that so far as is practicable they be brought into every family.

2. Whereas, the great evils of Slavery, Intemperance, and War, continue to exert their demoralizing and destructive influence throughout our land and the world, directly confronting every enterprise that looks to the elevation of the standard of piety, and the melioration of the condition of the human family—therefore, Resolved, That we deem it the duty of every Christian, not only to withhold all support from these evils, but to stand an uncompromising opponent of them, and in all reasonable ways to exert an influence for their overthrown.

3. Whereas, in our judgment, the swearing prohibited in the New Testament includes judicial oaths—therefore, Resolved, That we recommend to all Christians, in testifying before Courts, or otherwise, to avail themselves of the alternative almost everywhere offered to make a simple affirmation.

4. Resolved, That we feel urged to take higher ground with regard to Missionary Effort in this region of country, and that among the glorious results of an enlarged and more vigorous work, we look not least to an increase of ability to contribute in every thing that can be rendered available to the work of missions in the foreign field.

Brother Maxson Babcock was appointed a delegate to the Virginia Association, and Benjamin Clement to the Western Association.

E. P. Stout was appointed Corresponding Secretary for the ensuing year.

Corresponding Letter.

The Seventh-day Baptist Ohio Association, to the sister Associations, and brethren in Christ:—

DEAR BRETHREN,—We find ourselves under renewed obligations to our Heavenly Father for the rich blessing of his providence and grace which we have enjoyed during the past year; and especially that he has favored us with another opportunity of convening together to devise ways and means for the furtherance of Christ's kingdom. Our anniversary has been blessed with the presence of the great Head of the Church, and our deliberations have been of the most comfortable and encouraging character, and the brethren, in looking over our isolated position, the paucity of our numbers, and the poverty of our means, evinced a disposition to enter more vigorously into the missionary work, consecrating themselves anew to the cause of Christ. Eld. Thomas E. Babcock was with us as a delegate from the Western Association, and we have enjoyed his labors as a minister for several days, which labors have been blessed to our good in the reclaiming of backsliders, the conversion of our sons and daughters who were far from God, and the encouragment of the people of God; for which we desire to express our gratitude to the brethren of that Association, and pray that our Heavenly Father may abundantly bless them in their labors of love, and that the same spirit of friendly regard may always exist, not only between the Ohio and Western Associations, but between all our dear brethren who keep the commandments of God and the faith of the gospel. We have much to oppose us in our endeavors to spread God's truth among men, and humbly beg your sympathy and prayers.

The Secretaries were instructed to revise the minutes, forward them to the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder, and request their publication.

CALVIN DAVIS, Moderator.

BENJAMIN CLEMENT, } Secretaries.
J. P. FORSYTHE, }

ACCIDENTS LAST SABBATH.—Among the accidents in the vicinity of New York last Sabbath (Saturday,) we have to notice, that an express train on the Hudson River Railroad ran off the track near Yonkers, smashing one locomotive and several cars, killing two horses, and wounding one man. A man was run over by the Third-avenue Railroad cars, and so injured that he died at the Hospital. A carman, named Patk. Cudmore, accidentally backed his horse and cart into the dock at the foot of Nineteenth-st., N. Y., and both himself and horse were drowned. A painter, named John Dooley, was instantly killed by falling from a swinging scaffold on which he was at work at the corner of Broadway and Tenth-st., N. Y. Mr. Sutter, Chief Engineer on board the steamer Merlin, coming into the port of New York, was killed by the bursting of a cannon which he was firing for a pilot.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The cheering fact has already been announced, that the Sandwich Islands are now Christianized—that the foreign missionary work there has been accomplished—and that henceforth all that is done for them is to be done as for a Christian people in need of help, just as for Wisconsin, Iowa, or Oregon. The Annual Report of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, accompanies the above announcement with the following suggestions:—

As long as it shall be desirable to sustain foreign pastors at the Islands, it will probably be necessary for the churches of this country to aid more or less in their support. The cost of building churches has been borne by the natives from the beginning. They have also assumed the support of the common schools, and of the native seminary or college at Lahainaluna. The government appropriation for the Department of Public Instruction for the year commencing April 1st, was $47,735. It may be added, that the appropriation for the Department of Law and Justice, was $53,523; and $10,000 were appropriated for prisons on the Island of Oahu, where is the principal seaport town, and $10,000 for the public health.

Of churches on the Islands there are 26, with 22,236 members in regular standing; 1,644 of whom were admitted the past year. More than $24,000 were contributed by sixteen of these churches for the repair of houses of worship, the support of their pastors, and for various benevolent objects. The Auxiliary Hawaiian Missionary Society, following the course of things, has become an independent society, and has sent a mission of its own to the Marquesas, for which it chartered a vessel, and for the support of which, as the agent of the Island churches, it is wholly responsible. This mission is entirely native, and two of its four missionaries were from among the native pastors just mentioned, who cheerfully offered themselves for the service. The other two were deacons in the churches.

What has this intellectual, moral, religious, social creation of the Hawaiian nation cost the good people of the United States? The Board has expended $817,383; the Bible Society, $41,500; and the Tract Society, $23,800. The total is $882,683. It is considerable less than a million. The Exploring Expedition sent by the United States into those seas, cost more than this. It costs more to build a line-of-battle ship and keep it in service one year. And what contributor to this enterprise is poorer or less happy for what he has done for this peaceful conquest, this glorious extension of the Redeemer's reign?

ANTIOCH COLLEGE.

The following history of Antioch College, which we abridge from The Cincinnati Columbian, will be read with interest by many of our readers.

The Institution was opened on October 5, by the inauguration of the Hon. Horace Mann, late member of Congress from Massachusetts, as President. It is founded at Yellow Springs, Greene County, Ohio, by the "Christian Connexion," a body numbering about fifteen hundred Churches in the United States. This is their great denominational University, and will receive the patronage of the whole body, from Maine to California. It is called Antioch, because it was at that city in Syria that the disciples of Jesus were first called Christians.

The funds of this College have been raised in small sums, principally in scholarships of one hundred dollars each, of which more than one thousand have been taken up, making a foundation in that respect alone of more than one hundred thousand dollars to begin with. The interest of this money will legally be ten per cent., making a sum of more than ten thousand dollars annual income to pay the professors and teachers.

Each person who has given a scholarship is entitled to keep a scholar there till the end of time; thus, virtually, a tuition of ten dollars a year is paid on the scholar he sends to Antioch. Many of the scolarships will not, however, be used. The tuition for scholars who do not have the privilege of a scholarship, is twenty-four dollars annually. Judge Wm. Mills, of Yellow Springs, gave twenty acres of land to the Institution, as a site for the buildings, and contributed several thousand dollars in money. The funds generally are in a healthy and hopeful condition, and they will no doubt be materially and constantly increased. The largest amount was raised in Ohio, the next in New York, and then Pennsylvania, Virginia, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, &c.

The Institution is entirely liberal in religion. The students will be carefully taught and cared for in their moral and religious character, but they will be permitted to attend that church which they or their parents may prefer.

The college buildings at present erected stand on a beautiful and commanding slope, west of the ravine of the Springs, and within a quarter of a mile of the Mad River Railroad, midway between Xenia and Springfield, ninety miles from Cincinnati. Those nearly completed consist of one large central edifice, in the form of a cross, 170 feet long, and 110 feet wide, three stories high, of about 18 feet each, and a high basement story; and two halls for dormitories, 160 feet long each, 39 feet wide, and four stories high, besides the basement. The chief building is adorned with lofty towers, and is truly a majestic pile of architecture. It is designed for the chapel, library, lecture and recitation rooms, laboratory, cabinet, &c. The three buildings stand on three sides of an oblong square, and are to be connected by arcades. Two other halls for dormitories are to be built as soon as possible, in a similar style and size, and ranging parallel to the first ones, at a suitable distance. The patrons and founders of Antioch College also have an Observatory and Botanical Garden in prospect, which, if zeal and means can produce it, they intend shall be the very best in America. The climate of Ohio is admirably fitted for such a garden, lying, as it does, on the confines of both the vegetation of the tropical and temperate zones.

A large concourse assembled to dedicate this noble and hopeful institution. Among the audience were 300 students of both sexes, who came to enter the institution, which consists of two parts, a preparatory school and a college.

No person under twelve years of age will be admitted to the preparatory school. Both sexes are admissable, both to the faculty and as students.

Antioch College was incorporated in 1852. The annual commencement will take place on the Wednesday next preceding the Fourth of July, to be followed by a vacation of ten weeks with short vacations of one and two weeks.

THE AMERICAN BOARD.—From reports of the recent meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, we glean the following interesting statistics:—

The receipts for the year ending July 31st, were, from all sources, including the balance of $5 35 in the Treasurer's hands, $314,922 88. Of this sum, $305,055 58 were donations and legacies. The remaining $9,867 30 were interest on permanent funds, earnings of the mission press, &c. The expenditures during the same period were $310,607 59, leaving a balance in the treasury, August 1, 1853, of $4,320 64.

Since the last annual meeting, 43 missionary laborers, 16 males and 27 females, have been sent to different fields under the care of the Board. To the Armenians, 14; Choctaws, 11; Cherokees, 2; Ceylon, 4; Fuh-chau, 2; Assyria, 3; Syria, 3; Ahmednuggur, 2; Arcot, 2. In addition to these, 10 other missionary laborers, male and female, having spent some time in this country, have returned to fields previously occupied by them. Thus making a grand total of fifty-six missionaries and assistant missionaries sent out during the year. This is the largest number, with a single exception, ever sent into the missionary field by this Board in one year.

Eight young men are now under appointment in this country as missionaries, and five persons as assistant missionaries.

THE AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.—This free-mission organization held its annual meeting recently at Worcester, Mass. From the report of the Treasurer, it appears that the receipts during the year were $41,692, being a large increase over those of the previous year. The expenditures were $49,507. The Annual Report states that the Association has missions in Africa, Jamaica, Siam, Canada, California, among the Ojibwa Indians, and in the home field. During the past year, a missionary company of ten has been added to the African mission, two ministers and their wives to the Siam mission, twenty-one to the list of Home Missionaries, a new station established among the Indians at Pembina, and a mission to the Copts determined on. The demand upon the Society for Home Missions is rapidly increasing.

ROMAN CATHOLIC "CONSECRATION."—The ceremony of "consecrating" the three clergymen lately elected Bishops of the Roman Catholic dioceses of Brooklyn, N. Y., Newark, N. J., and Burlington, Vt., took place at the Cathedral in New York on Sunday last, and was witnessed by such as saw fit to pay one dollar for a ticket of admission. The pontifical procession, the display of clerical attire, the imposition of hands (the essential rite by which, according to the Roman Catholic faith, the power of the Episcopacy is communicated,) the delivery of the emblems of pastoral authority to the new Bishops, the solemn chanting by the choir in the chancel, and the sacred music of the chorus, together with the other ceremonies of the occasion, are represented as having been very imposing.

THE FREEWILL BAPTIST QUARTERLY.—This work completed its first volume with the October number. The publishers accompany the number with the following notice of the success of the enterprise:—

"Our Quarterly is an established FACT. It has passed through the first year of its publication with more than the expected success. We began 'not faithless but believing;' we expected difficulty and toil, and we had no idea of failure, and so made no provision for that—but our publication has sent back to us more of encouragement and promise than we had counted on. Our list of subscribers is longer than any of us predicted, and the names on it are those that speak kindly and bid us go on. The public press has given us a right-hand of welcome that was warm and cordial, and we return our grateful thanks."

MISSIONARIES FOR PALESTINE.—The bark J. Winthrop, which sailed from Boston for Smyrna, Oct. 10th, took out as missionaries to Palestine, Walter Dixon and family, of Groton, Mass., and a Mr. Jones, of Stockbridge, Mass. Mr. Dixon is a farmer, and goes out on his own responsibility, taking with him a family of six adults. Mr Jones is a farmer and mechanic, and goes out under the auspices of the Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews, intending to labor for that peple in connection with an agricultural school.

THE MEMORIAL.—The eighth number of the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial, (last No. of the second volume,) will be issued in a few days. It will contain a portrait of Nathan Wardner; biographies of Nathan Wardner, John Davis of Squam, N. J., Jacob Davis, and Jonathan Davis of Trenton, N. J.; a continuation of the History of Seventh-day Baptist Missions; Seventh-day Baptist Anniversaries; Statistics of the Churches for 1853; List of Ministers, with their post-office address.

The first No. of the third volumne of the Memorial will be issued in January, and contain a portrait and biographical sketch of James H. Cochran. All subscribers for the second volume will be considered as subscribers for the third, unless they notify us to the contrary before the first day of January.

The first and second volumes of the Memorial, bound separately or together, will be for sale soon. The price in paper will be $1 per volume; in muslin $1 25; in other styles according to the quality of binding.

The young men connected with the various M. E. Churches in the City of New York, are making extensive arrangements for a grand missionary demonstration, to be held on the afternoon and evening of the 2d of November, in Metropolitan Hall. Eminent speakers are being engaged for the occasion, and will no doubt excite much interest, both at home and abroad.

General Intelligence.

European News.

By the steamer Niagara we have European dates to Oct. 15th.

The Sultan has announced, that if the Russians do not evacuate the Principalities within fifteen days, Turkey will consider it as a case of declared war, and will act accordingly, but will not at present cross the Danube. The proclamation of war is posted on all the mosques. The Sultan has invited the combined fleets up to Constantinople. The Black Sea is free to neutral flags.

Louis Napoleon is reported to have stated on the 12th inst., that unless Russia yields, war must be proceeded with.

The Paris Correspondent of The London Globe says: "Notwithstanding all that we hear of preparations for war, the impression here that peace will be preserved is very general. The number of offers of aid to the Turkish Government from Poles, Hungarians, &c., is almost incredible. These offers are not confined to the refugees in France, but have come from the United States—from Hungary, Poland and Italy."

The Emperor of Russia has authorized the free importation, into any port of Finland, of all the materials for equipping ships. This privilege to endure for 5 years.

The Paris Police have made a search for Kossuth in the house of M. Kif, a Hungarian. Kossuth, however, was not there.

A letter from Turin says the Piedmontese Government had refused to admit M. Foresti, a naturalized American, as Consul for the United States, alleging that he is a disciple of Mazzini.

Miss Cunningham was liberated from prison at Florence.

Four Days Later.

The steamer Arctic, with four days later news, arrived at New York last Sunday afternoon.

The Eastern Question continues unchanged in its aspect. The Turkish Declaration of War is said to have been made known by Omer Pasha to the Russian Commander, in a brief and soldier-like letter, notifying him that on the 25th of October, at latest, the state of war would commence. The Czar, on his part, had declared that the war should be a war of extermination. Meantime the French and English negotiators think that their diplomacy will serve to confine the warfare to the Turkish frontiers, without its extending to the rest of Europe. Austria and Prussia declare their neutrality in the coming struggle. Paskiewich, the new Commander-in-Chief, has demanded to have 40,000 of the picked troops now in Poland placed under his special orders in the Principalities. It is difficult, in view of all the circumstances, to see how a general war of Europe can be prevented.

The discovery of the North-West Passage, by Commander McClure, is confirmed by this arrival. The Investigator entered the Frozen Sea from the Pacific by Behrings Straits, and came out by Davis's Straits. The immediate value of the discovery does not appear, owing to the cold, desolate and inhuman region passed through. The splendid heroism of the Commander and his men are not the less to be admired, because at this moment their discovery cannot be turned to practical account.

California News.

Two weeks later news from California, and about three millions dollars in gold dust, was received last week. We give the most interesting items of news.

The late disaffection on the part of a portion of the American and other foreign population in the Sandwich Islands, has created some interest at San Francisco, and there has been some talk of expeditions in that direction, but there will be none, at least not for some time.

A San Francisco paper says: Our domestic industry of every class is in a prosperous and satisfactory condition. The agricultural products of the country are very abundant, and the prevalent opinion among the farmers is, that California will raise enough grain next year for home consumption.

A suspension bridge over the Stanislaus has been completed.

The telegraph poles between San Francisco and San Jose have been erected, but the telegraph is not yet in operation. The telegraph from Sacramento to Nevada will be in operation on the 1st of December.

Several earthquakes were felt in the lower part of the San Joaquin Valley on the 2d of October.

The Indians at the head of Russian River have been troublesome, and the settlers in the neighborhood are talking of giving them a lesson.

The Rogue River Indians were induced to make peace on the 11th ult. They are to receive $60,000 for the land on the south side of the river.

There was a battle on the 12th ult., between the Applegate Indians and the rifle rangers. The latter lost one man, the former 12 or 14.

There have been several difficulties about land titles. In one case a man was killed.

The mines in Carson Valley are not profitable, and the settlers there are generally engaged in other occupations.

The Quartz mines in Grass Valley have lately been paying much better than formerly.

Rich diggings have lately been found in Lake Valley on Johnson's Route, on the eastern side of the Sierra Nevada.

Madame Pfeiffer, a lady of extraordinary energy and daring, who has made the tour of the world, arrived in San Francisco in the bark Seneca, from Batavia. She is perhaps the greatest traveler living, having traversed alone Asia Minor, Persia, Tartary, India, and penetrated into the unexplored depths of Malacca, Sumatra, Java, Borneo, and other East India Islands. She has made her way through howling wildernesses, inhabited by savage beasts and men equally savage, without fear or hesitation, and has always managed to extricate herself from the perils that beset her, by her address and courage.

The Alta California states that it has private advices from the Sandwich Islands, affording the information that an immense immigration thither of Russians, said to be 12,000 in number, is in preparation, under the immediate auspices of the Emperor.

Bible burning in New-York.—Exaggerated and incorrect statements having been made in relation to a recent case of Bible-burning at the Five Points in New York, Mr. A. Stonelake, a witness of the whole transaction, gives the following reliable account of it:—

"I was standing at one of the windows of the school-room of the House of Industry, when my attention was suddenly arrested by observing a man, a prominent Catholic, take from the hands of a child a newly-bound book. A few moments' observation convinced me it was a Bible. He turned the leaves over, one of which he tore out; drawing from his pocket a match, he struck it upon the pavement, ignited the leaf, then the stump of a cigar in his mouth, which having done, he deliberately communicated the burning leaf to the Bible. While doing so, he attracted the notice of some ten or a dozen boys, to whom something was said which I did not overhear; the purport, however, was soon but to apparent—the burning Bible was thrown into the centre of the street, and the boys, who were immediately joined by the stragglers around, encouraged and incited by the bystanders—of whom probably there were fifty within as many feet—commenced the work of kicking it about, amidst curses, language the most blasphemous, obscene shouts of brutal laughter, and riotous conduct of the worst description.

"I hesitated a moment, lest on endeavoring to rescue it I should be treated in the same manner; it was but a moment, however; without my hat, I went down to the street. The Bible at this moment was kicked smoking upon the stoop of the mission room of the House of Industry; from thence it was sent into the gutter; I followed amidst the mob, and secured the book in front of Donally's coal yard, some twenty yards from the place where it was ignited; I said a few words, and amid hoots and shouts and curses retreated to the house, where I presented the charred remains, still smoking and filthy, to Mr. Pease, who was at the time seated with his family and several friends at supper. The Bible is still in his possession, and may be seen by any person who may desire it."

Episcopal Matters.—The Triennial Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church recently closed a three weeks session in New York. From the reports of the daily papers, we gather the following items:—

The Introductory Discourse by Bishop McIlvaine stated that the Episcopal Church is unable to supply the demand for ministers for the rapidly growing towns and villages of the West.

Resolutions introduced by Rev. Dr. Scott, for augmenting the number of candidates for Holy Orders, developed the fact, that the average salaries of clergymen in Connecticut and Virginia, do not exceed $400 per annum. A well-known clergyman of New York asserted, that the true cause of the scarcity of candidates for orders lay in the fact that a large proportion of the clergymen of the Episcopal Church are "starving," "actually starving!"

From the reports of the Missionary Board, it would appear that the income falls considerably short of the expenditures. It was alledged that the cause of this is to be found in the distrust existing between the contributors and disbursers of the funds.

The admission of California as a Diocese was one of the earliest and most warmly debated questions acted on during the whole session. The matter was finally compromised by the appointment of a Missionary Bishop to that State.

The case of the seceding Bishop of North Carolina called for special legislation, to allow of the consecration of his successor, the Rev. Dr. Atkinson. The House of Bishops, and the House of Clerical and Lay Delegates, accordingly concurred in a canon to provide that "an abandonment of the Church, either by open renunciation or by formal admission into any other Church not in communion with this, was, ipso facto, a deposition."

The Convention took steps to secure the best and most correct edition of King James's Bible. A Committee of Collation will report on the matter at the next session of the Convention.

The Burned Mail Car.—The Mail Car which was burned on the Cleveland and Columbus Railroad, three weeks since, opened only at the sides, and there was no means of communicating with the Conductor or Engineer, consequently the train was not stopped until the flames, bursting out into the darkness of the night, attracted attention. When the train was finally stopped, the flames from the burning car were some twenty feet high, lighting up the country for miles around. The flames occupied the side apertures, and there was no ingress except through the ends, which were battered in as soon as they could be, and what was left unconsumed was taken out and extinguished as soon as possible. Of the baggage, out of some sixty trunks, scarcely a whole one was found. The mail shared a similar fate. Not a mail bag, either lock or canvass, was found worth repairing. Of their contents, some eight or ten bushels of the burned remnants have been saved, and now await in the Cleveland Post Office the orders of the Department. It is most of it due at Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis, and Southern offices. It came mostly from New York city, and included a very heavy foreign mail brought by the Atlantic. A very large portion of the New York matter consists of bills of goods, invoices, notes, drafts, acceptances, &c., the usual business paper of that large commercial city, which at this season of the year compose the larger portion of the mails West.

According to the last advices from China, Commodore Perry had acquired one of the Bo-nin Islands, (this is the correct spelling.) Those Islands are close to Japan, and Prof. Neumann, several years ago, gave a description of them from Japanese sources. Bo-nin is the Japanese pronunciation of two Chinese letters which mean uninhabited or empty islands. They have been known to the Japanese for ages, but no sovereignty has been pretended over them.

The Lancaster (Pa.) Independent Whig states that mining operations have just been commenced in the Pequea Valley, where valuable deposits of argentiferous Galena have been found, in some cases yielding as high as $500 of silver to the tun of ore. These discoveries extend over an area of some twenty-four square miles.

SUMMARY.

The Directors of the Crystal Palace have resolved to keep the Exhibition open through the winter, instead of closing it in December, as they had previously contemplated. They are impelled to this step by the pecuniary success they have steadily met with since the exhibition was complete, and by the consideration that an early close must deprive an immense number of persons of the pleasure and benefit of visiting the Palace. From the first of September to the present day, the receipts have been highly satisfactory, averaging four thousand dollars or more a day, while the current expenses are but $600. The receipts of the fortnight ending Oct. 22d, were $58,000. Stoves will be immediately erected in sufficient number to keep the building comfortable, and new ones will be added as the weather becomes more severe.

Died, in Clarkson, Monroe Co., on the 17th Oct., Cornelius Vroom, the sleeping man. While on exhibition in New York he was taken sick, which seemed to induce a wakeful state for a short period, and then a stupid condition, with intervals of wakefulness, until he was brought home on the 14th. He talked but very little, inquiring after his mother, who had been dead two years, his father and brothers, whom he seemed partially to recognize. He complained of great internal heat and soreness of his throat and stomach. On the morning of the day of his death he called for food, and ate a hearty meal, and from that time seemed to be in pain until about 2 o'clock P. M., when he died without a struggle. His age was some 34 years.

A new route from Boston to New York will be opened about the 1st of January next. At the Boston end, this route commences with the Norfolk County Road, and runs to Blackstone, a distance of 35 miles; from Backstone to Southbridge, a distance of 22 miles, a road is building, and is now nearly finished; thence from Southbrige to Norwich, over the Norwich and Worcester Road, 33 miles; crossing over a bridge, it here connects with the New London, Willimantic and Palmer Road to New London, 13 miles; from New London, over the New London and New Haven Road, 50 miles; from New Haven to New York, 76 miles. The St. Louis Intelligencer states that not long since the steamer Hillman, about an hour previous to her departure for the Illinois River, exploded or blew out the joint of her cross-pipe, over the after-end of the boilers, caused by an extra pressure of steam. It seems, on examination, that the safety-valve had been intentionally braced down in such a way that the boilers would have exploded before the safety-valve would have given warning to the engineers of any extra accumulation of steam. The trivial accident above alluded to, in all probability, saved the lives of many persons who were on board of the boat at the time.

The Chicago and Mississippi Railroad is completed, and the cars running through from Alton to Bloomington. This makes a continuous Railroad connection between the Mississippi and the East, and passengers who take the Southern Indiana and Michigan route can reach New York in the short space of 60 hours, or two days and a half. The table-of-time from St. Louis will be about as follows, if all the connections are made: To Chicago, 24 hours: Cleveland, 37; Buffalo, 43, and New York, 60 hours. To Pittsburgh, 43, and Philadelphia, 70 hours. Cincinnati, 36 hours.

A shrewd Yankee, at the Horse Exhibition, at Springfield, outrun the "striped pig," and came in ahead of the Maine Law. The Yankee hired a spot of land within the limits of the Arsenal grounds, which are beyond the jurisdiction of the Massachusetts authorities, having been ceded by that State to the United States—he not designating the purpose for which he wished to use it. He immediately erected a huge tent, which he supplied with liquors, and which were dealt out by some thirty or forty bar-tenders at a shilling a glass. He contends that the laws of the United States protect him in his traffic.

The law-suit noticed some months since, in which Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe and her husband are the plaintiffs, and F. W. Thomas, of Philadelphia, the publisher of a German translation of Uncle Tom's Cabin, the defendant, was taken up in the U. S. Court, at Philadelphia, Oct. 27, for argument before Judges Grier and Kane. The question at issue is, whether a copyright holds in any other language than that in which the work is entered. It was never raised before, and there is no precedent bearing on it, either in England or this country.

One hundred young men have left Richmond, Me., for Kentucky, where they intend to cut timber and build vessels. The vessels built will be floated down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.

Perhaps it may be doing our lady patrons a favor to tell them that isinglass, which may be found in most drug stores, is an excellent substitute for the white of eggs in clearing coffee. MARRIED,

On the 29th Sept., by Eld. V. Hull, Mr. Caleb V. Wells to Miss Martha Williams, all of Milton, Wis.

DIED,

In Petersburgh, N. Y., Sept. 7, after an illness of about five weeks, Mrs. Sarah Maxson, wife of Mr. Asa Maxson, in the seventy-second year of her age. The subject of this notice connected herself with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Petersburgh at the time of its organization. Her piety was uniform, and her daily life an ornament to the Christian profession which she made. She endured with patience the sufferings of her last sickness, and in quiet submission resigned her soul, body and spirit into the hands of her Heavenly Father. As the time of her departure was evidently approaching, she exulted in the exercise of a vigorous faith in view of the blessed change that awaited her. She had the assurance that angels and glorified spirits were beckoning her approach, and were preparing to receive her with hearty welcome into the regions of the blessed.

In Christiana, Dane Co., Wis., Oct. 19th, Elizabeth Crumb, in the 55th year of her age. Sister Crumb embraced religion when she was eleven years old, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Christ in DeRuyter, where she has remained ever since, and by a long life won to herself the confidence and friendship of all that knew her. She had long been wasting away by disease, and felt that her "departure was at hand;" and feeling a strong desire to see her children in this section of the country before she died, she left the home of her childhood, saying that if she could but reach her children that were here, and stay with them one week, she would be satisfied. One week after she reached my house, she was consigned to the tomb.

Sister E. was a worthy member of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield. She was hopefully converted to God in early life, and has given satisfactory evidence that she was feithful until death. She has left a widowed mother, a deeply afflicted husband, and many warmly attached relatives and friends, to lament their bereavement.

Miscellaneous.

A Home in the West.

Under date of Winnebago Co., Ill., Sept. 10, 1853, Gov. William Bebb gives, through the N. Y. Tribune, the following account of the country in which he lives. The article embodies so much information which is applicable to all parts of The West, that we are sure our readers will thank us for printing it.

From different sections of the State of Ohio, and other parts of the country, I have lately received numerous letters, propounding such inquiries, among others, as the following:—

1. What sort of a country have you?
2. What are your productions?
3. What facilities have you to market?
4. Are there any lands yet to be entered?
5. What can I get an improved farm for?
6. How do you fence and break up prairie lands?
7. How do you like your climate—is it healthful?
8. What is the character of your population?

To these interrogateries, suggesting sufficient matter for a volume, I propose very briefly to reply.

1. Geologically: We are on the "Cliff Limestone Formation," which gives character to so large a portion of the fertile lands of Western New York and Ohio, and of Northern Indiana and Illinois. This rock presents on the surface of the United States a very extended outline. It forms the upper stratum of the Falls of Niagara, of the Genesee and of the Ohio. It causes the rapids of Maumee, Wabash and Upper Mississippi. It composes most of the perpendicular cliffs of the Rock River, north of Oregon, and crops out in ledges or quarries along the margin of the brooks, affording valuable and abundant materials for building, and everywhere throwing out beautiful and perennial springs of water.

The surface is neither abrupt nor level, but lies in long undulating slopes, gently swelling for miles into elevations of a hundred feet, more or less, and then as gently declining to the next stream of water. Skirting all these rivers and streams, which are large enough to stop the headlong conflagration of a prairie fire, are found groves. Some of these groves, like that on the north side of the Pekatonica, are several miles wide, composed of tall and noble forest oaks, maples, elms, walnuts, &c.; but most of them are made up of short trees, with spreading branches, truly characterized by that expressive appellation, "Oak Openings," reminding you rather of English parks than American forests—trees standing here alone, and there in groups, with intervening lawns, as if they had been planted by the hand of the Almighty Landscape Gardener for ornament rather than for use. The soil is a rich, dark vegetable mould, underlaid by a fertile mulatto loam resting upon a clayey loam subsoil of calcareous origin. The intermediate alluvial bottoms of Rock River, like those of the Great Miami, are more sandy and rest on limestone gravel.

2. The productions are all the grains, and grasses, and fruits, and vegetables which flourish in Western New York. We have less snow than falls at Rochester, and our wheat suffers sometimes from want of covering in winter. When our farmers learn to plow deeper and bring up the loam to mix with the vegetable mold on the surface; when they sow with drills, so that the young plants may come up in little furrows, and that the snow may cover, and the earth crumble around their roots, they will be well paid for their pains. A belt of locust trees a rod wide around all our large 80 acre fields would be easily made, and would give us ornament, posts, shade and shelter, all of which we need. No region in the Union is better adapted to the production of apples. The latitude is just that wherein the Newtown pippin, Rhode Island greening, Esopus spitzenberg, Baldwin bellefluer, gravenstein and northern spy, and all the best American apples, originated and still flourish. The soil is a calcareous, clayey loam, the best of soils for the apple tree. The free winds and open exposure of the prairies keep back the buds until the spring frosts have ceased. Mr. Harkness, of Northern Illinois, took the first premium on apples at the United States Fruit Growers' Congress, Syracuse, and it is understood that he would have probably done so the next year at Cincinnati, had his apples arrived in time for entry at the Exhibition for premiums. He says that ever since his trees began to bear, twelve years ago, he has always had good crops of apples.

No other fruits have yet been fairly and fully tried. We are too far North for the best peaches and grapes. Pears and cherries and plums are likely to do better with us than further South. The most vigorous pear trees in the country are growing near Detroit. Is it not probable that the pear blight is the result of an attempt to cultivate the pear tree in a climate far south of its native habitat? The paradise of the pear tree is Flanders, and that of the heart cherry, Northern Germany. May not the summers of Southern Ohio, Indiana and Illinois be too long and too hot for both the pear and the heart cherries? Their leaves ripen and drop off in early autumn, and when the fall rains set in, their sap starts again, and the tree, during the following winter, is injured and ultimately destroyed. This hypothesis may not be well founded, but it seems to me quite as rational as some others that have been very confidently put forth.

3. No State in the Union has greater adaptions for internal commerce than Illinois. Bounded on the east by Lake Michigan, the Wabash and the Ohio rivers; on the west by the Mississippi, and traversed almost its whole length by the Illinois river and canal, it is surrounded and bissected by navigable streams. To which must be added the great Central Railroad from the mouth of the Ohio to La Salle, with one branch to the northwest corner of the State opposite Dubuque, and another to the northeast corner of Chicago, with the Central Michigan, the Southern Michigan, the Chicago and Milwaukee, the Chicago and Janesville, the Chicago and Galena, Chicago and Savana, Chicago and Fulton, Chicago and Rock Island, and a great number of other roads, running across the State from east to west, ere long to be completed.

These lakes, rivers, canals and roads will carry off our surplus productions, and bring us in return groceries from the South, coal and iron from the interior of the State, lead from Galena, lumber, iron and copper from Fond du Lac and Lake Superior, dry goods from the Eastern cities, and, what is more important to our true interests, enable us to develop our own resources, manufacture ourselves, furnish a home market for our teeming cumbrous agricultural products.

4. There are no lands to enter in Winnebago County, and all the vacant lands throughout the State, especially near to the projected lines of railroads, are being rapidly taken up. Fine lands at second hand may be bought at from five to twenty dollars per acre near Rockford.

5. The phrase "Improved Farm" means something in Ohio, where it costs ten dollars an acre to clear land. In Illinois it means practically nothing. I would much rather have a quarter section of virgin prairie, as it came from the hand of the Almighty, to make a farm of, than one that had been broken and cultivated just long enough to take the cream out of the land and let the weeds in. It costs but two dollars per acre to break up new prairie. It costs one dollar per acre to plow old land. The first crop is quite as good as any that follow, and you then have the land fresh, rich, mellow, and free from weeds. As a successful instance of the ease with which our prairies may be made to respond to the hand of industry, I give you the following facts: In June, 1851, I broke up 65 acres of prairie land, the remainder of the 80 acre lot being covered with grove. It lay unfenced until the ensuing winter, when the whole 80 acres were inclosed with a fence of posts and boards. In March, 1852, we sowed on the "breaking" two bushels and a peck of oats per acre, and harrowed the land lengthwise breaking furrow. We then sowed a peck of timothy grass seed per acre and harrowed the land the other way. The season proved favorable, and at harvest, with McCormick's Reaper, at a cost of 50 cents per acre, we cut off a very fine crop of oats from 60 acres; the other five acres not being quite ripe, we afterward cut and threw it to the cattle. Last winter we threshed out from the 60 acres three thousand bushels. The timothy came up finely in the stubble, and furnished abundant pasturage for forty cattle and eight horses from the time prairie-grass became hard until December. The oat straw having been harvested without rain and before it was too ripe, afforded a great amount of provender for the winter's feeding. This single crop of oats more than paid for the land, the fencing, breaking, seed, harrowing, harvesting and threshing, and now the land is in the best possible condition. You might plow it all day without touching a stump-root or stone, were it not lying under a beautiful crop of grass.

6. The usual mode of breaking prairie has been to hitch a strong team, say six pairs of oxen, to a large plow with wheels that turns a furrow two feet wide. This is done best in the month of June, when the prairie-grass is in full growth. Two objects are aimed at in breaking prairie—one is to kill the grass, the other to bring up loam to mix with the vegetable mold. Shallow breaking effects the former object best, but not the latter. Farmers are lately breaking more with a smaller plow, drawn by a pair of good horses. Fences are made in a great variety of ways; but situated as I am, near a railroad, and as many are soon to be, I prefer a fence of posts and pine boards, without which I am planting hedges of Osage Orange, to take the place of the fence as it shall decay.

7. Having been born south of 40 degrees north latitude, I would myself prefer a warmer climate, just as a New Yorker or New Englander prefers this. There are advantages and disadvantages on both sides. Southern Illinois has a milder winter, and an earlier spring. She can produce more Indian corn, better peaches and grapes, and earlier melons and culinary vegetables. On the other hand, she has more mud in winter and more oppressive, sultry weather in summer, as well as more agues and fevers in autumn. We have a cold, but dry and pleasant winter, and a delightful summer and autumn, lengthened somewhat, perhaps, by our prairie fires and consequent Indian Summers. March with us is the most boisterous and unpleasant month in the year. Rockriver has emphatically a salubrious climate.

In Winnebago County we have no agues. I never saw but one case in the country, and that down on the brink of the river. Inflammatory and lung diseases are thus far almost unknown. That great destroyer, Consumption, may become more formidable as we advance in wealth and luxury.

8. The mass of the population is from New England, New York, and Northern Ohio. Like their fathers at Plymouth Rock, they will have meeting-houses and common schools. They have a seminary for males at Mount Morris and for females at Rockford, and a college at Beloit. They are generally sober, industrious, enterprising and moral. A large majority of them would vote for the Maine Liquor Law.

If you never saw a Western Prairie, you have one of the great characteristic features of this continent yet to realize. It matters little whether you come in May, when the emerald grass is spangled with violets and the groves are redolent with the perfumes of the wild rose and crab-apple; or in June, when the violets are gone and in their place have come the phloxes and moccasin flowers, white, yellow and pink; or in August, when all the surface glows with helianthus and solidagos; or in mellow autumn, when the groves are clothed in crimson and gold, and when the forty varieties of perennial asters smile in the face of coming winter; or even during the holidays, while prairie fires sweep over slopes at night like contending armies in battle array. See a prairie for the first time when you may, it will fling around you a fascination much more easily felt and realized then described.

To sum up: Our portion of the Rock River Valley is a fertile limestone soil, lying admirable for agriculture. It is very easily subjected to the plough. It produces most of the grains, grasses, vegetables and fruits on an average as well as any other portion of the Union, though some particular crops are surer elsewhere. The average population will not compare unfavorably with that of any portion of the country. Our facilities for market are excelled by no new country in the West. Our prairie winds are cold in winter, and bleak in March and April, but, in return, we have delightful breezes in summer, and a bracing atmosphere always. The great advantage to a poor man here is, that he may cultivate cheap land. If you pay $100 per acre for land, the interest on the cost at 10 per cent. is $10. If you buy land at $1 per acre, the interest on the cost is only 10 cents per acre. Besides, land entered at Government price will soon be worth ten times its original cost; but it will take farm lands bought at $50 per acre a long time to double the original cost. Whenever I see a poor man settling down on a poor piece of rocky land, covered with spruce and pine, toiling to clear a little patch to raise a pittance for his wife and children, I wish he could see the rolling prairies of the West.

Gold vs. Hay.

The Ohio Farmer, in commenting upon the letter of a California correspondent, makes some very sensible remarks about the mania which has possessed the people of this country to forsake the golden fields of their own State to dig in the "gold fields" of California, where they often gather more disappointment than produce. The Farmer says:—

It has ever been our opinion, that the ultimate prosperity of California, or any other State, must be influenced more by its adaptation to agricultural pursuits than by any or all the gold mines that have been or may be found therein. There can be no sort of doubt but that the greatest source of wealth which California possesses is found in the rich valleys, table lands, and mountain slopes, so graphically described by Fremont, and now so ably noticed by Mr. Kelley. When these resources are developed, as they will be very soon, the gold diggings and quartz rock will sink into comparative insignificance. Look at it. It is said that the yield of gold from the California mines for the current year will reach the enormous sum of fifty-five or sixty millions of dollars? An enormous sum truly; and yet we venture to say, that the value of the hay crop alone of the State of New York will fully equal it! Six counties of that State produced in 1850, 800,000 tuns of hay, which, at $7 per tun, would be $5,600,000. This they do year after year, with a gradual increase; and yet, how few are seen rushing to the meadows of Oneida, Jefferson, Chenango, Delaware, Chautauque, or St. Lawrence!

The wheat and corn fields of Ohio produce annually more dollars than the gold mines of California. Yet, there is no noise made about it; and instead of thousands rushing to them in the hope of growing suddenly rich, thousands have been fleeing from them, in search of gold—gold—gold.

We hazard nothing in saying, that had the emigrants to California, since the discovery of gold there, gone, instead, to the rich lands of our Western States, they could have produced double the amount of all the gold dug from the mines of that El Dorado. The capital necessary to place a man in working condition in the California mines, would have settled him comfortably on an eighty-acre lot in Iowa, in a good cabin, with a team, farming utensils, provisions, &c., and insured him, instead of a chance for a little gold, the certainty of an independent position for life, without the sacrifice of home, friends, health, morals, and indeed all that men should esteem valuable in life.

Thank Heaven, the "gold mania" is in its decadence, and the time is near when it will be seen and known, that every ounce of gold dust dug from the California mines has cost twice its market value.

A Startling Contrast.

We do not remember to have found for years, in our daily voyages on the great ocean of newspaperdom, as much suggestive matter in so small a compass, as is contained in the following statement, from the New York Economist:—

"The United States army numbers about 10,000 men, and they cost the country last year $8,225,246 for pay, subsistence, clothing, &c. That is to say, $820 per man, or, if we deduct the militia expenses, $800 per man. It would puzzle any one to tell us of what service were those men, living uselessly in barracks and old forts, eating three meals per day, and turning out occasionally to touch their caps to their officers.

"The Illinois Central Railroad army numbers ten thousand men also, and they receive from the company $3,700,000 per annum, in return for which they labor twelve hours per day upon a work which gradually stretches itself through the most fertile plains, connecting the Great Lakes with the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and ultimately with the Gulf of Mexico."

The relative advantages of these two armies to society, present an interesting matter for study, and are graphically sketched by the New York Post. The prospective buildings of the great Central Railroad of Illinois alone, has added to the wealth of that State, in the appropriation of wild lands, the sum of forty millions within a strip of but twelve miles in width, and the actual construction of the road will bring to a ready market millions of acres of land owned by the general government, which, were the road not constructed, would lay waste for years to come. The federal government employs ten thousand men, at an expense of eight millions of dollars, to carry muskets. The Central Railroad Company, employing ten thousand men at less than four millions of dollars, confers a vast property upon the State, upon the federal government, and upon thousands of farmers. Year after year the government spends its millions of dollars, effecting nothing, producing nothing, and resulting in nothing but the turning loose of superannuated soldiers, made paupers by a life of idleness, to pray upon the industrious during the remainder of their existence.

The Illinois Company, by three years' expenditure, establishes seven hundred miles of iron rails through prolific farms, many of them owned by the persons whom they employed to build the road—men of industry, vigor, wealth, and intelligence. The United States, in 30 years, have spent $300,000,000, enough to build a double track to the Pacific, and they have nothing to show for the money but some old forts, guns, tattered uniforms, and demoralized veterans. Curious Device in Grafting.—The gardeners in Italy sell plants of jesimines, roses, honey-suckles, &c., all growing together from a stock of orange, myrtle, or promegranate, on which they say they are grafted. But this is a mere deception; the fact being, that the stock has its centre bored out, so as to be made hollow, through which the stems of jesimines and other flexible plants are easily made to pass, their roots intermingling with those of the stock. After growing for a time, the increase in the diameter of the stems, thus enclosed, forces them together, and they assume all the appearance of being united to one common stem.

Autumn.

Thou comest, Autumn! bearing in thy train
Offerings of luscious fruit and golden grain;
Upon thy brow a coronet is placed
More gorgeous far than Eastern prince e'er graced.

A sound of mirth is borne upon the breeze,
Where the blithe reapers bind their harvest sheaves;
They hail thee with rejoicing, and the while
Thou greetest them with thine approving smile.

Thy minstrels are the winds, whose lyric strains
Re-echo far o'er hills and sylvan plains;
Now the sweet notes are musical and low,
As the faint rippling of the streamlets flow;

Anon, fall sad and plaintive on the ear,
As t'were the death-song of the passing year,
Now swelling on the gale, and now a sigh,
Soft as an infant's evening lullaby.

Thou passest on, fair Autumn! soon again
Stern Winter will resume his chilling reign;
Thy mild dominion in our hearts will be Enshrined as a delightful memory.

A Modern Cincinnatus.

Under this head, the Wilmington (N. C.) Free Press gives the following:—

At the session of the South Carolina Legislature in 1814, the members were perplexed for a suitable man to elect Governor. The difficulty did not arise from any scarcity of candidates, for then, as now, men were ambitious, but from a want of the right sort of man. The matter became worse as the time wore on, and the election of some objectionable candidate seemed inevitable. One day, however, as several of them were conversing upon the matter, Judge O'Neall, then a young man, and present by invitation, said: "Gentlemen, why not elect General David R. Williams?" "David R. Williams! he's our man—he's the man!" they all exclaimed, as they began to scatter to tell the news. The day of election came on, and Gen. Williams was elected by a large vote. A messenger was at once dispatched with a carefully prepared letter to inform the General of his election, requesting his acceptance, and hoping he would name the day on which he would take the oath of office. After a long hard ride, the messenger stopped at the General's residence, in Marlborough District, we believe, and inquired if he was in. He was told that Mr. Williams was over at his plantation. The gentleman said he would ride over, as he had a note to deliver to him as soon as possible. When about half way, he met a fine-looking man, dressed in plain homespun, and driving a team of mules. "Am I on the road to the plantation of General Williams?" asked the messenger. "Yes, sir; it is about a mile further on," was the reply. "Is the General at home?" "No, sir." "Where is he?" "I am Gen. Williams." "You Gen. David R. Williams?" "I am the man." "Don't deceive me. I have an important letter for General Williams." "If that is your name," said the doubting messenger, "here it is," handing the letter to the General. Mr. Williams opened the letter, and found, to his utter astonishment, that, without his knowledge or consent, he had been elected Governor of South Carolina. He took the messenger home, and entertained him for the night, preparing a note in the mean time, accepting the appointment, and naming a time on which he would be in Columbia. The messenger returned. On the appointed day, a few minutes before 12, a man dressed in homespun, and on horseback, rode into town, hitching his animal to a tree, he made his way to the Capitol, where he found a brilliant concourse of people. But few knew him personally; still there was something commanding about him. He took his seat in a vacant chair; and when the clock in front of the Speaker had struck the hour of twelve, the General arose, and delivered the most masterly speech that had ever been delivered there. The farmer-statesman entirely electrified the assembly. He made an excellent Governor.

Fattening Hogs.

It is pretty generally conceded, that the cheapest way to make pork is to keep a breed of swine that, coming in April, shall be fat and weigh 250 to 300 lbs. by the first of November. We have no doubt but this is the case—that pork can be made, all things considered, much cheaper in this way than in any other. Yet we have a liking for a "twenty score" hog. Hams from such a pig are deservedly esteemed by all epicures, and will ever command, if well cured and dried, high prices.

Some will say that you can make spring hogs weigh 400 lbs by the fall. This in rare instances has been done, but we know of no breed which, under ordinary treatment, will average any such weight. If heavy hogs are desired, they must be farrowed in the fall, and killed when 12 to 15 months old.

In this, as in most other cases, an exclusive adherence to one system, to the entire abandonment of the other, is unwise. On an average sized farm, we would always have one litter of pigs in the fall, and one, or two if you like, in the spring. If you have more fall shoats than you can winter well on offal, sell a few to your neighbors when six weeks or two months old for $1, 50 or $2. The rest will run in the barn-yard, eat up what would otherwise be wasted, and be fine fellows in spring, ready to graze as soon as clover is ready for them. Clover, sour milk, whey, wash of the kitchen, &c., will keep them in good growing condition during the summer—green corn, small potatoes, wind-fall apples, nubbins, and buggy peas will finish the work—and in this way pork will be produced without the consumption of any of the high-priced cereal grains which require that their effect on the animal shall be greatly beneficial to compensate for their exhausting effect on the soil producing them. On the other hand, as we said before, an hundred weight of pork can, probably, be made from spring pigs cheaper and at less expense to the farmer than from any other. To do it, however, more forcing food is required. You must not keep too many. The shoats must be kept fat all the time, or they will not mature early enough.

Nothing will pay better on a wheat farm, taking manure into consideration, than to grow peas for feeding green to pigs during summer and early fall. They do well on them, and what they do not eat they will trample into the richest kind of manure. To fat hogs on good corn worth 70 cents per bushel will not pay, unless an unusually high price is obtained for the pork. The price of cattle food, and the price of meat produced by its consumption, would, under normal conditions, always indicate the true relation which they bear to each other. But this normal condition does not exist; thousands of bushels of corn are annually produced, in the fertile valleys of the West, that are not worth 25 cents per bushel. This corn can be used for pork-making and the pork be shipped to our market at little cost, thus disturbing the natural equilibrium, and rendering it necessary that we should sell our corn rather than convert it into pork or beef.

We must not attempt competition with our Western brethren in raising corn for pork making, but rather aim at raising those crops which from their bulk and weight are not subject to such competition. But to do this we must have manure, and to make this we must make pork or beef or mutton. Ah! there's the rub. To grow two tons of timothy hay per acre, or 40 bushels of wheat, we must sooner or later return to the soil. Without at present entering into the reasons for our belief, we think that fattening hogs by growing peas to feed to them green and early in the fall, before they are much injured by the bug, will be found one of the most economical means of enriching a farm.

The Slave vs. the Master.

A case of great interest was decided in the Covington Circuit Court, yesterday. We have been at some difficulty in obtaining the facts, which are as follows: Sam Norris, a colored man, has been living in Covington about five years, has married a free colored woman, and has had by her several children. He belongs to a Mr. J. N. Patton, of Virginia, who permitted him to come to Covington and engage in whatever service he thought proper, on condition that Sam would pay him, out of his earnings, a stipulated sum per annum. We believe about $100. The surplus, whatever it might be, was to belong to the slave. Sam was punctual for several years. He was sober and industrious in his way, and very prosperous. About two years ago, Mr. Patton came west on a visit, and agreed with Sam, that if he would pay him the sum of $400, within four years, he would give him his freedom. Sam gratefully accepted the proposal, and at once paid down, out of his hard earnings, $135; and has since given his master some $40 or $50 more.

Patton now comes forward to rescind the contract and claim his slave. The case was yesterday decided by the Hon. Judge Pryor. In delivering his decision, his Honor stated the following facts:

1. That the laws of Kentucky recognize but two modes of liberating slaves—by will, and by deeds of emancipation.

2. That a slave cannot make a contract.

3. That the contract was executory, and the time fixed for the negro's freedom, future and contingent.

4. That so long as Sam was a slave, the master was entitled to his services, and the money he (Patton) had received, was in law his own.

The opinion was able and elaborate, and the authorities numerous and decided. His Honor characterized the case as one of great hardship and cruelty, and every one in the court room seemed to sympathize deeply with the poor negro. The case, we understand, has been appealed to the Supreme Court of the State. [Cin. Com. 22d. Oct.

Application of Electricity to Weaving. An important improvement has recently been announced in Italy, consisting of the application of electricity to the Jacquart loom, in a manner which combines simplicity with economy, to a remarkable degree. The inventor of this method is Signor Bonelli, the General Director of the Sardinian telegraph. In the Jacquart loom, the figures are produced by a movement on a pedal operated by the weaver himself, instead of employing children, as in the old way, to draw the threads, under the loom. This improved method, however, is not without defects. For instance, with the passage of every thread, a cartoon of a certain size is necessary, pierced with holes arranged so as to correspond with the design. These cartoons are not a little expensive, as for certain designs 60,000 are requisite, and for the least complicated colors about 1,500 are usually employed, costing 15 francs a hundred. But the expense is not the only objection. They make a hideous noise in working, require a large scaffolding, and take up a great deal of room. The machinery, moreover, is very complicated, and easily gets out of order.

All these difficulties are prevented by the application of electricity. It avoids the use of complicated mechanism, of cartoons, and in fact of machinery almost altogether. The threads are raised by a pedal, as with the present arrangement, and by means of a fine copper wire, are subjected to a current of electricity, which does the work at once.

The necessary steps to procure a patent for this invention in Europe and the United States have been commenced, and as soon as they are completed, the electrical loom will be exhibited to the public at Turin [Tribune.

A Model Village.—The Utica papers give an interesting account of the reception of Benjamin S. Walcott, Esq., of New York Mills, by the operatives of his establishment, on his return from a tour of twelve months in Europe and the East. All the work-people of the several factories, with their children, in their holiday suits, numbering upwards of a thousand persons, marched in procession to the large new factory building, where arrangements had been made for the public reception of their beloved and venerable employer. A hall, decorated with banners, flowers, and mottoes, was appropriated to the public exercises. After suitable music, Mr. Walcott was welcomed in a very neat address, to which he responded in a feeling manner. He then briefly recounted his travels, and contrasted the condition of the laboring classes in other countries with that of the operatives in New York Mills. The company then adjourned to the spacious dining hall, where a substantial repast was in waiting. Here the festivities were diversified with music and addresses, and the company separated with mutual congratulations and good wishes. This entertainment was got up by the operatives themselves, at an expense of some Two Thousand Dollars. The reception was planned by them, and all the arrangements were make by working at extra hours. [Independent.

The water from the Congress Spring, at Saratoga, has been imported into France. The question has been raised why it was called Congress water? The obvious answer, of course, did not escape the wits: "Because it contained so much gas!"

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address A. MENEELY'S SONS, West Troy, N. Y.

The Sabbath Recorder.

OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

The Universal Observance of the Sabbath in Millennial Times.

We are, however, far from believing, that the worst of Israel's portrayed sin, in relation to the Sabbath and otherwise, is already past. The prophets exhibit the crisis of their rebellion as being in the last times; and in our own day there seems a preparation for it. Superstition is giving place to infidelity; and the avowed principles and the existing practice of the Rationalizing Jews of Europe seem to indicate a near approach to that awful state which Ezekiel foretells as immediately to precede the final purgation by sore judgments. The divine commission of Moses, and the inspiration of his books, are disbelieved; the Redeemer, whose day their fathers saw and rejoiced in, is not their hope and confidence; and the Promised Land, in which the pilgrim patriarchs by faith chose to sojurn, and which is praised by Israel's God as the glory of all lands, is, by many of their degenerate descendants, now little esteemed. That country, wherever situated, they openly exclaim, which gives us equal privileges, is our best fatherland, and we look for no Messiah henceforth, of supernatural character. Of their need of the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world, they are woefully ignorant; and all the ordinances designed for their spiritual elevation, they undervalue or despise. The Sabbath itself, with all it was designed and is fitted to teach, some of them have wholly abandoned, regardless of the blessing with which Jehovah has invested it. Progressing in this fatal course, and preferring to walk in ways that are not good, may they not easily become a prey to the snares of "him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish, because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved." The apostacy of Israel is not consummated until that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." 2 Thes. ii. 3, 4, 9, 10.

Our limits do not admit of our here adducing the evidence on which our convictions rest, that the Lawless One, the Man of Sin, the Little Horn of the Prophet Daniel, has yet to arise. But we regard it as certain, that all the Ten Horns of the Fourth Great Beast seen in the prophet's recorded vision, symbolize that number of kings, who shall sway the sceptres of Asia and Europe, in so far as the power of Rome extended over those countries, first in its undivided state, and afterward as the Eastern and Western Empire—clearly indicated in the legs, terminating with the ten toes, in the Great Image. These horns or toes being yet undeveloped, (for we are not to find nor to seek all the toes upon one foot,) we still have to expect, as future, the little horn that shall arise after them, symbolizing a king with "a mouth speaking great things," who shall even "speak great words against the Most High, and who shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws." Dan. vii. 8, 24, 25. His usurpation is over and among the people of Israel, especially; and this is the last daring transgression into which that rebellious people shall be led, submitting themselves as they do to the guidance of a blasphemous individual, energized by Satan, and availing himself of their rebellion more effectually to do dishonor to the living God. As if Heaven's appointments were not the embodiment alike of infinite wisdom, and were susceptible of improvement at his hand, he proposes "to change times and laws." And just as the Pope of Rome availed himself of the preëxisting apostacy of the Christian Church, consolidating and perpetuating that change of the Sabbath which had been already begun, so may it be that this Man of Sin and Son of Perdition, who "shall speak marvelous things against the God of gods," (Dan. xi. 36,) seek to give form and consistency to Israel's rebellion, when they say, "We shall be like unto the nations;" and as respects them also, and with other help, in respect to the Sabbath as well as to other of the divine appointments, may he "think to change times and laws." But however melancholy to contemplate their fate, it is matter of satisfaction to find, that there are those by whom his ungodliness is opposed, though he does "wear out the saints of the Most High." Although more especially spoken of in connection with Israel's faith and faithlessness, we do not conceive that the operations of this rebel, or the effect of this rebellion, will be confined to the house of Israel. Gentile nations give to him their power; and "because of the voice of the great words which the Horn spake," the Roman Beast itself, with all its other horns, is to be destroyed. Involved in the fate of this wicked power, so also will they have been accessary to his iniquity.

BLESSED ARE THEY THAT MOURN.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

Oh! deem not they are blessed alone
Whose lives a peaceful tenor keep;
The Power who pities man has shown
A blessing for the eyes that weep.

The light of smiles shall fill again
The lids that overflow with tears;
And weary hours of woe and pain
Are promises of happy years,

There is a day of sunny rest
For every dark and troubled night;
And grief may hide, an evening guest,
But joy shall come with early light.

And thou, who o'er thy friend's low bier
Sheddest the bitter drops like rain,
Hope that a happier, brighter shore
Will give him to thy arms again.

Nor let the good man's trust depart,
Though life its common gift deny,
Though pierced and broken be his heart,
And spurned of men, he goes to die.

For God has marked each sorrowing day,
And numbered every secret tear;
And heaven's long age of bliss shall pay
For all its children suffer here.

"SOUTHERN AID SOCIETY."

One of the most curious and significant movements of the present day, is the organization of a Society, in the city of New York, to aid Southern slaveholding churches in sustaining the institutions of religion. Had not the circumstance been announced in a very authoritative way, incredulity would have been pardonable. But now there is no room for incredulity. Of this new organization, bearing the title at the head of this article, one of the daily papers gives the following account:

The object is the diffusion of the Gospel truth in the Southern and South-Western States, and in all ordinary cases this to be done under the direction of ecclesiastical bodies, or missionary organizations of an evangelical character, within said States. The President is James Boorman, and among the Vice Presidents are Anson G. Phelps, Dr. Cox, and Cyrus P. Smith. Mr. Hallock, of The Journal of Commerce, is Treasurer, and Dr. Bethune, Dr. Baird, and Dr. Eddy, of Newark, are on the Executive Committee.

The Society has just issued a long address to the public, in which they fully recognize the importance of other societies and hope for their aid and co-operation, especially of the American Home Missionary Society. But they say that Society "is restricted by its rules from aiding any minister or missionary, however faithful, laborious, or self-denying, who under any circumstances is a slaveholder. And, secondly, the impression is general at the South, that the Home Missionary Society is closely allied to Abolitionism, so called. The impression, however erroneous, renders the aid afforded by that Society to churches in the Southern and South-Western States, of doubtful value in reference to success; insomuch that, in some cases where such aid had been rendered, it has been voluntarily relinquished by the recipients, needy though they were, as a damage rather than a benefit. While, therefore, we are convinced that the American Home Missionary Society, without a change of policy, is essentially unable, even if it were disposed, to perform our work, we desire still to cherish toward it the sentiments of kindness and good will, which, with some of us, date back to its organization, and even before; for some of us aided in its formation. Most of the members of the Southern Aid Society are, and long have been, supporters of the American Home Missionary Society; and some of them are among its largest contributors. They expect to aid it still. They rejoice in its efficient labors at the North and West, and hope, in some measure, to supply its lack of service at the South and South-West. The whole country is our field. In so far as it is occupied by the American Home Missionary Society, we gladly co-operate. Where that Society pauses or falters, there the Southern Aid Society begins its separate action, and thence proceeds. Thus, between the two, if Providence smile upon our efforts, the whole of our beloved country will be cared for and aided, according to the measure of the benefactions of the churches."

With regard to their mode of operations they say: "The Southern Aid Society intend to deal with their Southern brethren in the confidence of Christian friendship. Reproach, calumny, and all sorts of injustice, have been tried upon the South for a quarter of a century, without any good results; the Southern Aid Society will try the opposite policy of kindness, sympathy, and co-operation in every good word and work. Let us treat our Southern fellow-citizens and fellow-Christians with generous confidence—with fraternal appreciation; and see if this more excellent way will not prosper!—if the benediction of God will not crown it, to his own glory and the good of all! Thus doing, we are fully persuaded that, through the counsel and concurrence of corresponding bodies at the South, our missionaries will be able to preach the Gospel in its power and purity, to every master and every slave who can be reached by any human instrumentality. If the Christian public will give us the necessary means, and the Lord add his blessing, we may hope for great results, ultimately, from the operations of this Society."

In pleading for aids for their assumed constituents, they say:—

"Have the slave population no claim upon us? What have they done that we may not sustain a faithful ministry in teaching them the way of salvation? May we not send them missionaries without accompanying our benevolence with such measures as shall suggest a doubt to the people whether we are content to seek their conversion with the simplicity of the early Christians? Need we have the least apprehension lest the regenerating and purifying influence of the Scriptures should fail of its proper action upon the best interests of all—the servants, the masters, the church, and the State?

"The slave population in the South are peculiarly susceptible to a good religious influence. Their mere residence among a Christian people, even under all the disadvantages of bondage, has wrought a great and happy change in their condition. They have been raised from the night of heathenism to the light of Christianity. Thousands of them have been brought to a saving knowledge of the Gospel. Of the 100,000,000 of the negro race, there cannot be found another so large a body as the 3,000,000 slaves in these United States, at once so intelligent, so inclined to the Gospel, and so blest by the elevating influences of civilization and Christianity. Nor is there any one great class of population in our country, that has such claims upon our sympathies. If we are to remember the poor, and if it is according to the very genius of our religion that the poor should have the Gospel preached to them, we ought not to withhold our hands from the work under the pretence of first improving their civil and political relations; and if we are to remember those that are in bonds, as bound with them, can we do less than aid those who are willing to teach them the way of life? Will not God hold us to a strict account, if, under any pretext whatever, we neglect to minister to their spiritual necessities, when we have such a favorable opportunity of so doing?"

They also add that the masters are favorable to such an enterprise; that "they are, in as great proportion, perhaps, as any equal body of Christian ministers in the whole world, faithful men of God, spiritually minded, self-denying disciples of the Lord Jesus."

Their address closes with a strong caveat against even the suspicion of Abolitionism, promising not to meddle for or against Slavery, and commending their enterprise to the Lord Jesus Christ, God and Man.

RUINS OF ANCIENT BABYLON.

The French Government has employed a party of gentlemen to explore the site of ancient Babylon. From reports just received from them, it appears that they have ascertained, beyond reasonable doubt, that the ruins beneath a tumulus, called the Kasr, are those of the marvelous palace citadel of Semiramis and Nebuchadnezzar. They are in such a state of confusion and decay, that it is impossible to form from them any idea of the extent or character of the edifice. They appear, however, to extend beneath the bed of the Euphrates—a circumstance accounted for by the change in the course of that river. In them have been found sarcophagi, of clumsy execution and strange form, and so small that the bodies of the dead must have been packed up in them; the chin touching the knees, and the arms being pressed on the breast by the legs. The sarcophagi have every appearance of having been used for the lowest class of society; but, notwithstanding the place in which they were found, the discoverers are inclined to think they are of Parthian, not Chaldean origin.

There have also been found numerous fragments of enameled bricks, containing portions of the figures of men and animals, together with cuneiform inscriptions; the latter white in color, upon a blue ground. According to M. Freshnel, the chief of the expedition, these bricks afford a strong proof that the ruins are those of the palace of Nebuchadnezzar, inasmuch as the ornaments on them appear to be sporting subjects, such as are described by Ctesias and Diodorus.

The foundations having been dug down to in certain parts, it has been ascertained that they are formed of bricks about a foot square, united by a strong cement, and that they are in blocks, as if they had been sapped in all directions.

In a tumulus called Amram, to the south of Kasr, interesting discoveries have also been made. They appear to be the ruins of the dependencies of the palace, situated on the left bank of the Euphrates; and they contain numerous sarcophagi, in which were found skeletons clothed in a sort of armor, and wearing crowns of gold on their heads. When touched, the skeletons, with the exception of some parts of the skulls, fell into dust; but the iron, though rusty, and the gold of the crowns, are in a fair state of preservation. M. Freshnel thinks that the dead in the sarcophagi were some of the soldiers of Alexander or Seleucus. The crowns are simple bands, with three leaves in the shape of laurel on one side, and three on the other. The leaves are very neatly executed. Beneath the bands are leaves of gold, which it is supposed covered the eyes. From the quantity of iron found in some of the coffins, it appears that the bodies were entirely enveloped in it; and in one there is no iron, but some ear-rings, a proof that it was occupied by a female. The sarcophagi are about two and three-quarter yards in length, by between half and three-quarters of a yard wide, and are entirely formed of bricks, united by mortar. In addition to all this, a tomb, containing statuettes in marble or alabaster, of Juno, Venus, and of a reclining figure wearing a Phrygian cap, together with some rings, ear-rings, and other articles of jewelry, has been found, as also numerous statuettes, vases, phials, articles of pottery, black stones, &c., &c., of Greek, Persian, or Chaldean workmanship. THE HISTORY OF SERMONS.

When shall the world be favored with a history of the pulpit, and who will write it? Such a work is a great desideratum, and, well executed, might prove of incalculable value. The world is full of material, which only needs to be collected, sifted, and arranged. Let some one of our men of might gird himself for the task.

One chapter in such a work, or perhaps more, should be given to the origin and history of sermons, and curious indeed would be its developments; especially if all their secret history could be made known. Let us give two or three facts, which may go to show somewhat of what we mean:—

One of the most beautiful and popular sermons of Robert Hall is the one occasioned by the death of the amiable Princess Charlotte, who died in 1817—a sermon which he had not even thought of delivering an hour before its commencement. Devoted to his duty, this eminent man seldom looked at a newspaper, and was supremely ignorant of passing events, so that he was not aware of the time when the Princess was to be buried. The funeral ceremony took place on Wednesday evening, just at the time of Mr. Hall's weekly lecture. Royal bereavment generally have attention paid them from the pulpit, especially at the hour of interment, but the thought never occurred to Mr. Hall that anything more than an ordinary service would take place at Harvey Lane. On his arrival there, as usual, behold, the whole house was lighted up and crowded. 'How is this, sir?' asked Mr. Hall of one of the deacons. 'What does this crowd mean?' 'Why, sir, the Princess Charlotte, you know, is buried this evening, and the people are come to hear your funeral sermon for her.' 'Well, sir, I am very sorry, but I had entirely forgotten it; ask Mr. —— to introduce the service, and I will sit down in the vestry, and endeavor to think of something to say.' The substance of the sermon on the topic, which appears in the first volume of his works, was the result of half an hour's reflection; the sermon was afterward written and published, and produced great effects. The widowed Prince described it as the best of all sermons sent him on the occasion; and another eminent man thought that the production of such a sermon went far to account for the mysterious removal of the Princess.

Much smaller events than the removal of the great have suggested good sermons. The admirable discourse of "Walking by Faith," the first sermon by Fuller, owed its origin to a smaller matter. It was delivered at an annual meeting of the Northamptonshire Association, at whose request it was printed. Like the sermon of his friend Hall, not a word of it was written till after its delivery. On his way to the Association the roads in several places were flooded, arising from the recent rains, which had made the rivers overflow. Mr. Fuller came to one place where, the water was very deep, and he, being a stranger to its exact depth, was unwilling to go on. A plain countryman, residing in the neighborhood, better acquainted with the water than the preacher, cried out, 'Go, on, sir; you are quite safe.' Fuller urged on his horse; but the water soon touched his saddle, and he stopped to think. 'Go, on, sir, all is right,' shouted the man. Taking the man at his word, Fuller proceeded, and the text was suggested, "We walk by faith, not by sight."

A GIRL'S WISDOM AND EARNESTNESS.

About twenty years ago, the committee of the Bible Society, at the suggestion of the Rev. Hugh Stowell, unanimously resolved to present to every emancipated negro, capable of reading, a New Testament of suitable size. A special fund was raised for this purpose, and public meetings were held in many parts of England and Wales in furtherance of this design. On the morning after one of these meetings at a town where Dr. Steinhopff was the guest of a friend, one of his little daughters, accompanied by two or three of her younger sisters, presented him with a sealed packet, requesting it might not be opened until he should have left the house, saying, "We hope it may be accepted as a small contribution from four little girls, to assist in the supply of the Holy Scriptures to the poor negro children in the West Indies." Her parents had left the room, but there was a gentleman present who had breakfasted with them—an intimate friend of the family—who listened to the words of the dear child with marked interest. That gentleman was Dr. Steinhopff's only companion in a long journey during the rest of the day, and shortly after taking their seats in the coach, the seal of the little packet was broken, and to his surprise, the Doctor found that it contained nearly five pounds. On his alluding to the scene they had just witnessed, his companion's eyes filled with tears as he said, "Yes, sir, she is indeed an interesting child; but she is much more, for she is a pious Christian." And after a pause, he said, with evidently deep feeling, "To that child, sir, I am indebted for all my happiness upon earth, and all my hopes for eternity." He added, that he had been connected in business with her excellent father, but, unlike him, was not a believer in the truths of the Bible, and had made no secret of his unbelief. On one occasion, this dear child, then only nine years old, was present when her father was endeavoring, but in vain, to convince this gentleman of his fatal error. When the painful conversation ended, and her father had left the room, she asked this gentleman to take a walk with her in the garden; and when no one could overhear them, she inquired whether she might ask him a question. "Certainly," he replied; "any question you please." "Then," said she, "have you ever read the New Testament through with a desire to understand it?" "No," he answered, "I never have." "I thought so," said she; "for I am sure you would not have spoken of it to my father as you did just now, if you had." And in an earnest manner she added, "Oh! do read it, and do wish to understand." His concluding words were, "My dear sir, that child's entreaties and tears did far more than any argument had ever done; they led me to the Bible, and the Bible led me to my Saviour."

A HAPPY HINDOO GIRL.

Elizabeth Ann, a little East Indian girl, attended for a considerable time at the mission day-school, Bellary. She was always very obedient to her teacher, and tried to get on nicely with her lessons. She was remarkable for an amiable and affectionate disposition, and was much loved by all. But at length she fell sick, and for many days was very ill. Amid all the pain, however, which she suffered, she never complained, but bore it with patience, because she knew that it was God who afflicted her. She had no wish to recover, and seemed to think that God was going to take her to heaven; and this thought made her very happy. She knew that she had been a great sinner, but she knew also that the blood of Jesus could take away all sin. At one time she said to her mother, "O, mother, I have been a very wicked girl; but were not Mary Magdalene, and Paul, and Manasseh, pardoned?" Before her mother could answer, she cried out, "Yes, Lord, I believe it, for thou hast pardoned me." She then spoke many sweet words about the Saviour. At another time she said, "Don't cry for me, mother; I am going to my Father in heaven; Jesus will come, yes, he will come and take me to himself." To a friend who called to see her, and who directed her mind to the tender love of Jesus, in the midst of sorrow and suffering, she said, "O my Saviour, my Saviour!" She then said, "Pray for me," and during the time prayer was being offered, she lifted up her hands and cried, "O Lord, undertake for me."

A day or two before her death she said, "Mother, I am going; God bless you!" Her mother rejoined, "My poor child!" She replied, "No, [illegible] going to my Father in Heaven." She then turned to her brother and said, "God bless you, and you too, sister;" and to several others who were in the room, she said the same thing. She then appeared to be in earnest prayer that God would bless them all, and repeated these words: "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come; yea, come, buy wine and milk, without money and without price." She also repeated many favorite hymns, with which her mind was well stored. The last words which she was heard to say were, "My Father! my Father!" and thus her happy spirit took its flight, to be forever with the blessed Saviour, who had redeemed her, and washed her in his own precious blood.

Are you not ready to say, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like hers!"

THE JOY OF BENEVOLENCE.

Let any one for a moment look outside of himself—lose sight of self-aggrandizement, and embrace within his wishes simply the happiness of others, and immediately his nature rises above its sordid self, assumes its native beauty and majesty, is reänimated with a spirit of joy, and proclaims to the glory of God, its author, that existence is a blessing. How much, then, do we lose in our intercourse with the world, how much of the comforts of Christianity, when we forget that to give is more blessed than to receive? Andrew Fuller, at one period of his labors with the church at Kettering, devoted much time in an effort to remove the doubts and administer to the comforts of his flock. But their complaints, after his utmost endeavors, being unabated, he was at a loss what to do next. Just at this time he became interested and actively engaged in the India Mission. His church followed his example and lent their aid to this great cause. Immediately the cry of despondency was hushed, and his people enjoyed fully the comforts of Christianity. "Freely ye have received, freely give." [Indian Advocate.

A WORD TO IDLERS.—A person once called and introduced himself by saying, that "he was come to spend an idle hour with Mr. Benson." "Be assured," said that eminent man, "that Mr. Benson has no idle hours to spend. He never has any idle hours. From seventeen to eighteen hours he spends every day, either in reading, studying, writing, praying, or preaching. Besides, he is going to preach this evening; and he mostly spends an hour upon his knees before he goes into the pulpit." With some degree of confusion the person withdrew; and it was hoped that he learned, by the mode of his reception, never again to disturb ministers when they are preparing to preach, or to imagine that they have idle hours to spend with idle people who are not conscious of the value of time.

It is a ridiculous thing to be miserable beforehand, in fear of misery to come, for a man loses the present, which he might enjoy, in expectation of the future. Miseries are endless, if we stand in fear of all possibilities.

MIXED MARRIAGES.

The Apostle says of the married woman, that "if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will, only in the Lord." 1 Cor. 7: 39. The qualifying expression, "only in the Lord," shows that she is to marry only a Christian; no other meaning can fairly be given to it. For the Corinthians had submitted the question, whether those who had unbelieving or idolatrous partners should abandon them. They doubted whether a Christian might even retain, as husband or wife, one who was an unbeliever. To be satisfied about it, they consulted the Apostle. His answer was, that the Christian husband should not put away his unbelieving wife; that the Christian wife should not depart from her unbelieving husband; that the unbelieving party was no more unclean to the other, than the unbelieving children were to their believing parents. Thus he decides that, where the relation already exists, it is not to be ruptured upon the reception of the gospel by one of the parties, but to be maintained in the hope that it may prove the means of salvation to the other also. But if death has dissolved the relation, rendering it lawful to the survivor to enter into a second marriage, then by all means let the new connection be "only in the Lord," that is, only with a believer.

Now no imaginable reason can be assigned why a widow should be restricted to a believer in marriage, which does not apply with equal force to those who form the connection for the first time. Besides, God has always frowned upon the marriage of "the sons of God" with "the daughters of men." Gen. 6: 2. His ancient people were expressly prohibited from entering into such connection. Deut. [illegible] The violation of this law by Solomon was the means of turning away his heart from the worship of Jehovah. 1 Kings 11: 4. And indeed we think it may be set down as one of the most fruitful sources of religious declension which affects the church of God in these days.

It is next to impossible for a man to maintain the family altar, and train up his children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, when the wife is in heart opposed to such things. The affection which he bears for her, the desire which he feels to render her home wholly agreeable, and his repugnance to any thing like conflict with one whose sympathy and smiles are every thing that he can rely on to render his earthly life pleasant, will sooner or later prompt him to relax his diligence. He feels, too, that it is a vain effort to lead his children in a way that the mother disapproves, or in reference to which she, at best, is indifferent. Her influence is that which moulds their young minds—her example that which they imitate. He cannot counteract her influence. She baffles his utmost skill, and at last he feels that it is useless to strive any longer, and gives it up altogether.

To the woman who has an ungodly husband, it is worse still. On the supposition that she is a living Christian, how desolate her home must seem, that is not at the same time the welcome abode of her Saviour also! O how painful to find, by daily experience, that, though her husband has a home for his wife, he has none for his wife's Saviour! He erects no altar to the God she worships; he maintains no form of family prayer; never asks a blessing at table; never calls his household together to instruct them in heavenly things; never talks to his children about God and heaven; cannot enter into her religious feelings, nor appreciate them; in short seems to be living without God in the world. We say, her home is desolate; for that place is desolate where Christ does not manifest his presence, no matter how sumptuously it may be furnished with things that gratify the flesh.

Now we say, that a woman who has given herself to Christ, has no business to place herself in such a situation. It is hard work enough to maintain the Christian conflict, even though aided by all the advantages of a godly home. Immeasurably is the difficulty increased, when home influences are all against her. A Christian woman has no business to put herself in a family, even temporarily, which will endanger her growth in the divine life; much less is she entitled to put herself in such a situation for life. "Seek first the kingdom of God," is the principle by which she should be governed in contracting matrimony, as well as in other undertakings. Does she sincerely pray, "Lead me not into temptation?" Why, then, does she wantonly run into temptation? She will not—she cannot—till she has 'left her first love.' It is only when religious zeal has somewhat declined, and worldly pleasures begin to fascinate the heart, that our young sisters are willing to ally themselves to those who have no fear of God before their eyes.

We cannot write as much as we would on this point, lest we should become lengthy. But, before closing, we would add a word in reference to the intermarriages of our people with those of other denominations. Now we have not a word to say against the general piety of those who differ from us. The excellent of the earth are not exclusively among Seventh-day Baptists; they are found among all denominations. But we never see or hear of a Seventh-day Baptist contracting marriage with an observer of the first day of the week, without the most serious apprehensions, that the final result will be an abandonment of the Sabbath. Indeed, our denomination has lost as much in this way as almost any other. Even our young men run great risks, when they take such a step; but far greater is the hazard to our young women. If they make dutiful wives, they must come under subjection. Eph. 5: 22, 23. The husband is the ruler of his own house, and if he says that no work shall be done on Sunday, it is the duty of the wife to submit. She is not bound to submit so far as to put her own hands to work on the Sabbath, it is true; but if her husband chooses that work shall be done on the premises, and brings on a company of men to do it, for whom meals must be prepared, she has no alternative but to submit to see her house a scene of busy toil during all the sacred hours. If the husband chooses to call his children into the work also, it is not for her to oppose; she must yield. And however determined she may be, at first, never to pollute her own conscience, she finds, at last, that her resolution is giving way. She grows weary of the struggle; she abandons the Sabbath; and comforts herself with the hope, that she can get to heaven by doing as Christians of other denominations do.

This is not a fancy sketch. We could cite a number of cases that have fallen under our own observation, confirmatory of what we say. And we must say, in view of every thing, that we hereby enter our solemn protest against the intermarriages of our own people with other orders, especially in the case of females.

OUR MISSION TO PALESTINE.

As the day draws near when our missionaries are to sail 'to the land where the patriarchs rest, where the bones of the prophets are laid,' let us as a denomination come up nobly to the work of fitting out our brethren and sisters, so that when once there, they may have every thing necessary, and give themselves wholly to the work.

The implements for agriculture in that country should be like our own; therefore, let our brethren who are farmers, and have on hand any spare farming tools, or who may suggest what may be needed and would be best to have purchased, at once inform the Committee how much they can furnish, &c.

Brethren who are carpenters, can you send us a saw, bit, or augur, or any tool which may be needed in the erection of buildings? Cannot other mechanics render essential aid in this way, and not feel it themselves?

And then, again, our sisters are to be fitted out for keeping house and entertaining strangers; their home is not only to be the home of the Arab, but also of the kings and princes of the East who may visit that country. Therefore, let the sisters see what they can spare to render their home in Palestine pleasant and agreeable; and at once look over, not only their closets, but also their wardrobes, and lay by for this purpose such useful articles as they can spare, and which may be needed.

Let us awake at once to the claims upon us, and let our missionaries have not only the needful articles, but the pleasing reflection, that the denomination enters heartily into the measures for sustaining the mission.

THE SCHOOL AT SHILOH, N. J.

SHILOH, N. J., Nov. 3, 1853.

It is well known, as far as the community are acquainted with Shiloh, that a Classical School has been in operation here for five years past. It was established by the energetic and persevering labors of E. P. Larkin, and he had the charge of the school for three years. It was kept the first two years in the Lecture Room belonging to the congregation, with some private rooms for recitation and music. In 1850 the Seventh-day Baptist congregation built them a new house of worship, and gave the old house (being a substantial brick building) for educational purposes. It was fitted up at considerable expense for the convenience of the school, and has since been used for that purpose. An extensive scientific apparatus, with abundant material adapted to a full development of the sciences, has been procured. The last two years the school was under the instruction of Wm. C. Whitford and lady. They having left for other engagements and duties, the Trustees were successful in procuring the services of C. Rollin Burdick and lady, who are now in charge of the school, and who have thus far given very general satisfaction; and with the prospects we are somewhat encouraged. Though the number of students is not as large as would be desirable, it will be increased the winter term, which will commence December 15. They have employed Mr. Morton, who is a professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music, and master of his profession; and he now has interesting classes in those sciences. Should any of the young gentlemen and ladies from abroad wish to avail themselves of the advantages that our school affords, we would be happy to extend to them all its facilities. Believing that we have ample accommodations and competent teachers in all the branches to be taught, we do not hesitate in recommending it to the patronage of an enlightened public.

W. B. GILLETT.

THE RUPTURE BETWEEN TURKEY AND RUSSIA.—In the opinion of Mr. Layard, the great explorer of the ruins of Nineveh, as stated by him in Parliament, the disturbance between Russia and Turkey has had a good deal to do with the liberality of the Sultan towards the Christians of the Protestant faith in his Empire. The teaching of the American missionaries is felt, he says, more or less, in every considerable town in the Sultan's dominions. The converts were sometimes subjected to trials and persecutions from the heads of churches to which they originally belonged, until by the efforts of the British Minister they were recognized by the Porte as one of the religious sects of the Empire. As the spirit of religious inquiry extended among the Greeks, the Greek clergy became alarmed, and, backed by the Russian Mission, have done all in their power to check the movement; and the Czar being the head of the Greek church, has been endeavoring by his hostile exertions to take revenge on the Sultan for his commendable conduct towards Protestant sects.

A MISSIONARY DEMONSTRATION.

"A Missionary Demonstration," so called, under the direction of young men connected with the Methodist denomination, was held on Fourth-day of last week, afternoon and evening, in Metropolitan Hall, New York. In the afternoon, the Hall was filled to overflowing, mostly with children, for whose special edification several addresses were delivered, they themselves doing the singing and taking up a handsome collection. In the evening, a large, intelligent, and enthusiastic audience, filled the Hall, and listened to missionary addresses by Bishop Waugh, Rev. Dr. Thompson, President of the Wesleyan University, Bishop Simpson, Rev. R. S. Foster, and Rev. Mr. Taylor. We copy from one of the daily papers a portion of the report of Bishop Simpson's address:—

Was the excitement caused by the demonstration of the day merely temporary, or did it possess those elements which would ensure its perpetuity? He believed that the missionary cause would prosper, even were it a purely human enterprise, because it is identified with many of the best instincts of humanity. Some of these instincts he enumerated: First, our Sociability. It is not possible for man to live alone—we find our chief pleasure in society. Christianity brought mankind together. Secondly, our Curiosity. All men were by nature inquisitive. Without constant communication this craving after knowledge could not be satisfied. The religion of Christ was a uniter of nations. Thirdly, our Sympathy. We pitied the suffering heathen. Thus was this holy feeling on our side. Fourthly, our Love of the Heroic. A Missionary was a greater hero than Cæsar or Alexander. But we had other prompters around and above us. Every day we were reminded of other nations. Our tables and our persons were covered and our stores were filled with foreign productions. Every advance of science brought us into nearer communion with our brethren abroad, both benighted and enlightened. The friends of science and literature, too, were interested in our cause; for a knowledge of the theories of Newton and La Place, and the thoughts of our manly literature, followed the Missionary's footsteps. It was for the interest of science to bring men together, that thereby the intellects of the thinkers of all nations might be employed in extending the empire of Mind over Matter. Our great discoveries—of the Daguerreotype, for example, the optic lens, and the telegraph—were the joint production of America, England, France, and Holland. In the world of matter, the greater number of plates that are put in an electric battery, the greater is the power acquired. So in the realms of reason. The greater number of minds that are brought to bear on any subject, the more rapidly is darkness dispelled from it. Christianity would unite the spiritual lights of the earth. From the North and South, from Europe and Australia, from Asia and America, and the isles of the sea, would the men of intellect come on a mission of death to spiritual darkness—dispelling and to dispell.

But besides these instincts and interests, we had stronger assurance of success; this, namely: Because the sovereignty of the Saviour requires it; because the heathen are his possession. God has said that even as HE lives the whole world shall be full of HIS glory. Conquer it, then, young men, for God!

RELIGION IN CALIFORNIA.

Rev. J. H. Brayton recently delivered a lecture in New York on the religious condition of California, an abstract of which we find in one of the daily papers. The lecturer commenced by remarking that the finger of Providence was evidently concerned in the events which occurred in 1848 in connection with this western settlement. In that year a contract was made by the United States Government with the Pacific Steamship Company, for the transmission of mails. Early in May of the same year peace was declared with with Mexico, and California became one of our possessions. In that or the succeeding week gold was discovered; and it was about this time that Missionaries commenced their work in that country, having arrived there before obtaining intelligence of that event.

It was in the Union Theological Seminary of New York that a fellow student first had his attention turned to that field as one that would hereafter become of great interest and importance. He, in company with a classmate, enlisted in the Home Missionary Society, and had just obtained the appointment to proceed thither, when the news of the discovery of gold reached this coast. There could be no clearer evidence of the direction of Providence in this matter, than that the population who rushed there at the cry of gold should be met by the preachers of the Gospel. Besides those who went from this part of the country, the Rev. Mr. Hunt, who had charge of a church at Honolulu on the Sandwich Islands, whose members flocked to San Francisco, joined in the missionary work in that city. This was the commencement of the missionary enterprise in California.

After describing the harbor and city of San Francisco, the lecturer proceeded to describe the land in the neighborhood as most beautiful and fertile. It was impossible to conceive of any thing more exquisitely beautiful than those valleys, when adorned with all the verdure of spring. The slopes of the hills were covered with green, consisting either of wild oats or wild grass, studded here and there with proud and lofty trees, and richly interspersed with nature's choicest ornaments, flowers and shrubs. The country around the city, for fifteen or twenty miles, was of the most attractive character, and well adapted for villa residences and excellent homes.

One hundred and twenty miles up the Sacramento River stood the city of Sacramento; and along the coast for seven or eight hundred miles there was a country, bounded by the high mountain peaks on the north and the Sacramento valley on the south, which was hemmed in between the hills, and was overflowed during the winter and spring. On the San Joaquin River stood Stockton, and in addition to the principal towns were many smaller ones, rising in various parts of the country. Auburn and Culloma, where gold was first discovered, were places of considerable interest. At first, the inhabitants of these towns were exceedingly uninviting, and their morals of the lowest description. But during the last five years, great improvements had been effected in this respect.

To the Rev. Mr. Taylor, a Methodist Missionary, was due the credit of being the first to raise his voice in the plaza of San Francisco, in the praise of the living God. He commenced first by giving out a hymn and singing it himself. This attracted the attention of the bystanders, and in a short time he was joined by a considerable number of that mixed population. He availed himself of the opportunity to proclaim to them the truths of the Gospel, and after continuous efforts he succeeded in securing the attention of the more serious portion. This humble beginning was succeeded by more systematic efforts, and the establishment of a church. The Rev. Mr. Hunt soon commenced preaching in a small room in the same city, with services of a very simple nature. It was gratifying to see that now these cities and towns contained many churches, with their beautiful white spires, bearing substantial evidence of the success which has attended missionary labors in that country.

Cities and towns which a few years ago were composed of the humblest tents were now being constructed of substantial brick, and the streets were presenting so much the appearance of our own eastern cities, that were it not for the absence of friends and the superior character of the climate, it would be easy to imagine one's self at home.

During his stay in the country, Mr. Brayton had met with several instances of monomaniacs, or rather he should say moneymaniacs. One was that of an old gentleman from Philadelphia, who had conceived the idea of a revelation, made to him in a dream, of a lake with sands of gold, which he believed he should find somewhere between the hills. He succeeded in converting hundreds and thousands of people to his faith, who followed him over hills and through ravines several hundred miles, till at last, losing their confidence in their new prophet, they attempted to make him a martyr to his delusion. He, however, escaped from their violence, and his disciples returned to their homes.

The Sunday was observed there in a very different way from what he had been accustomed to. At one place where he was preaching he found that two auctioneers were rivaling him in their attractions. Some of the people would stand and listen to his preaching for some time, and then would divert their attention to the proceedings of the auctioneers, who were expending their eloquence in praise of the horses and cattle which were being exhibited before them.

There were nearly a hundred thousand Mexican Catholics, twenty-five thousand Chinese, and a vast number of various other nations, now resident in California; and, although the state of society there was bad—although gambling was carried on to a fearful extent, and other vices existed which were deeply to be deplored—these were being subdued by the influence of enlightened Christianity, and California might be pronounced as better than either India, China, or any of the Pagan nations. Political corruption, however, was the most difficult to be removed. He believed that California would ere long become the great center of missionary operations for the conversion of the Pagan world. A few years ago it was difficult to find one in twenty of the settlers who did not intend to return to their homes, but now there was scarcely one in twenty who had not determined upon remaining there, finding that the seasons were pleasanter than in the Eastern States, and the scenery more inviting and more grand.

RELIGION AND TEMPERANCE.

The following excellent Resolves were unanimously adopted by the Southern Church of Western Pennsylvania at its late Synodical Convention at Lewistown, Miffin Co.:—

Whereas, Universal experience has proved Intemperance to be one of the giant evils of the world, spreading its baneful influence not only over the destinies of individuals, but also of families, of churches, and of nations: And whereas, the manufacture and traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage, which are the grand means of perpetuating this curse of humanity, have been legalized by legislative action and license, and all moral influence has, after ample experiment, been proved inadequate to the suppression of this evil: And whereas, an effort has for several years been in progress, by the philanthropists, patriots and Christians of our land, to exterminate it by prohibitory legal action, which a kind Providence has crowned with signal success in the State of Maine and elsewhere, reclaiming to his right mind the deluded inebriate, and spreading peace, joy, and domestic comfort, over multitudes of families before steeped in destitution, misery and degradation: therefore

Resolved, That this Synod cordially approves of the effort now in progress in our commonwealth to secure the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law, as the only effectual remedy for the curse of Intemperance.

Resolved, That in view of the solemn fact revealed to us in God's Holy Word, that "no drunkard shall inherit the Kingdom of God," the responsibility for this evil is distinctly brought within the province of the Christian Ministry and Church, and that we, as Ministers and lay representatives of the church, will do everything in our power, by Christian and lawful means, to secure the enactment of such a law, and to promote and preserve such a state of public opinion as will secure its faithful execution when enacted.

BAPTIST CHURCH ERECTION.—At the General Convention of Baptists, held in Troy last May, a resolution was adopted to enter upon the collection of a permanent fund for aiding feeble churches in the erection of edifices for public worship, and it was referred to the Home Mission Committee to devise a plan for the fund and its proper distribution. This Committee have recently matured their plan, which embraces among its features, proposals to make the fund in part permanent, using only the interest, and part circulating, as the donors shall designate; appropriations to be made only to make the last payment on any church edifice; and will be made either in the form of loans, or donations, according to circumstances. Before the appropriation is made, it is proposed to require that the church shall be finished, without any incumbrance, and will be kept insured for at least one half its value. The monies are to be collected as the ordinary Home Mission funds—contributions being available for making like members, &c. No specific time for collection is appointed, nor is any definite sum fixed upon—though the original action at Troy contemplated, we believe, the sum of $50,000. The Lutherans, it will be remembered, have resolved upon raising a fund of this description, $50,000. Thus the fourth denominational movement for this great want of the age is inaugurated.

MISSIONARY FAREWELL.—A party of Episcopalian missionaries being about to sail for Shanghae, a farewell meeting was held in New York on the evening of the 4th instant. The party consists of Bishop and Mrs. Boone, J. T. Points, Tong-Chu-Kiang, Ne-Boo-Boo (female,) Miss Wray, and Miss Conover, the latter two now going out for the first time. Addresses were delivered by Bishops Wainright and Hawes, Rev. Drs. Nevins and Hawkes, and Mr. Tong-Chu-Kiang, a native of China, and a convert to Christianity, who accompanied Bishop Boone on his visit hither. Mr. Tong is a very young man—we should think about 20—and was dressed in his native costume, and spoke in very good English, to the following effect:—

MY CHRISTIAN BRETHREN: I shall speak but a very few words. I am gratified to see what I see, and hear what I hear. I never expected, in my own country, to see such things. I have seen this country and I have seen its people. It is a great country, and the people are a wise people. They are not a wise people of themselves, but because they know God—the true God—the Christian's God. I was at one time an idolater; but now my eyes are open, and I see the great difference between Christianity and idolatry. I am now happy. My heart burns with love. I wish all my country people would know God and be happy. You have done much for us. I hope you will continue the ministrations of your ministers, and teach us—teach us salvation and sanctification. I have now seen and heard, and I shall go to the work, to which I have been called, with vigor and great strength. Now is the time to help my country. The Revolutionary movement there embraces the principles of Christianity. I thank you for what you have done. Do more.

Previous to the dismission of the congregation, plates for subscriptions in aid of the China Mission were passed round, and $650 were collected.

JAMES G. BIRNEY.—James G. Birney, once the Liberty-party candidate for the Presidency, is spending the autumn and winter in Philadelphia. Mr. B. owns a respectable property near East Saginaw, Mich. The Enterprize of that town says:—

"Something of the nature of a paralytic stroke has somewhat impeded the use of his limbs, and renders it difficult for him to articulate distinctly; yet he walks erect with dignity, and presents a very healthy and agreeable appearance. The profession of the law, in which he has stood eminent, he now devotes scarcely any attention to; though it is said that many of his neighbors are occasionally indebted to him for very valuable legal advice, for which no charge is made. Though a decided opponent to human Slavery, he is not the fanatic which many unacquainted with him take him to be. Mr. Birney's claims to the Presidency were not considered to be valid, nor do his views appear to meet with general favor; yet he is a very estimable man, or his neighbors are egregiously mistaken."

MEANING OF "LIFE-MEMBERSHIP."—Not long since, an agent of one of the benevolent societies, called upon an individual who had on a former occasion, years ago, contributed liberally. He was told that his "cause was an excellent one," &c.; "but," added the individual, "I have constituted myself a life-member of your society, and do not expect to be called upon any longer for donations." "You have misunderstood the meaning of life-membership," said the agent. "Ah! how so?" inquired the benevolent gentleman. "Life-membership means that you are to continue to give to this cause all your lifetime, and to increase your donations from year to year as the Lord prospers you."

BARNES' NOTES ON DANIEL.—Leavitt & Allen, 27 Dey-st., N. Y., have just published a volume of "Notes, critical, illustrative, and practical, on the Book of Daniel, with an Introductory Dissertation, by ALBERT BARNES." The Introduction occupies some eighty pages, and has sections on the Life of Daniel, the Genuineness and Authenticity of the Book of Daniel, the Design and General Character of the Book, the Apocryphal Additions to it, the Ancient Versions, Exegetical Helps, &c. The Notes are marked by sound learning and practical sense, and embody the results of extensive research. As helps to the student of prophecy and history, they will prove invaluable.

EXEMPTION OF SLAVES FROM ATTACHMENT.—The Hartford Courant has the following, which the Louisville Presbyterian Herald copies without comment:—

"Considerable effort is being made at the South to exempt slaves from attachment for debt. Much is said on both sides. It is claimed by those who oppose the measure, that many men would turn all their property into slaves, and thus escape the payment of their just debts. On the other hand, it is thought that this would be an additional step towards connecting the slave with the estate, and that soon one could not be separated from the other. A kind master, even if he lost his property, would be enabled by this law to prevent his negroes from being sold. Any measure must be a proper one that will to any extent prevent the disruption of families now so common at the South."

EMANCIPATION OF SLAVES.—A Maryland paper says that John Fisher, Esq., of Westminister, recently gave freedom to his entire lot of slaves, five in number, four of whom, with quite as much furniture and money as would satisfy approachable fastidious white folks, removed to Pennsylvania. One of these four was held in the highest estimation by Mr. F., and thousands of dollars would have been no inducement for her sale. The fifth remains at home, preferring the steadfast assurance of a proper administration to his wants in slavery, than to buffet the adversities of life with his freedom, although he is a stout, athletic and healthy man.

PETITIONS AGAINST NUNNERIES.—One of the most important and most popular subjects which has come before Parliament in the course of the present session, is that of the confinement of young females in the nunneries. Without popular excitement, without public meetings or speeches, nearly five hundred petitions, signed by upwards of two hundred thousand persons, have been presented to the House of Commons on this question; and not only so, but the House itself has shown its perception of the importance of the subject, having twice defeated the Government, in the presence of Lord John Russell himself, on this very question.

"FOR SENATOR, NATHAN V. HULL."—Such an announcement we find among the Free Democratic State Nominations, under the editorial head of the Genesee Valley Free Press of Nov. 2d. Whether there is any prospect that this nomination will result in the temporary transfer of Eld. Hull's services from the Church to the State, we are not informed.

THE MAINE LAW IN WISCONSIN.—A letter from Eld. Stillman Coon, dated Milton, Wis., Oct. 26, 1853, says:—

"Our State is all astir on the question of the Maine Law. Mass meetings and lectures in its favor are as frequent almost as the weeks roll round, in nearly every village in the State. We are very sanguine that there will be a great majority in favor of the law."

PASTORAL CHANGE.—Eld. James Bailey has removed from Little Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., and taken the pastoral care of the church at Plainfield, N. J., where he preached last Sabbath.

NEBRASKA TERRITORY.—A Washington paper says that the organization of Nebraska, under a territorial government, can hardly fail to become one of the most important questions in issue before Congress at the next session. Immediately on the borders of Missouri and Iowa, the soil and agricultural advantages generally, including the supply of timber, are undoubtedly very fine, probably equaling those of any of the new States. As one goes west, however, the timber decreases, so that much of the territory is almost totally unfit for cultivation on account of its scarcity. Some of the tribes settled there are utterly opposed to being moved West, quoting Gen. Jackson's pledge given when they were located there, "that the country should be theirs while water ran and trees grew," in answer to persuasions to sell. Some few are willing to sell out entirely to the United States, while others will make a treaty of cession for part of their lands. At present, the wild Indians are bitterly opposed to Col. Benson's project of turning in upon them squatters from Missouri and Iowa, in opposition to the command of the Government of the United States; while the half breeds and civilized Indians, anticipating that such intruders cannot much longer be kept out, are becoming anxious for the prompt organization of a regular Territorial Government, which may have sufficient strength for the enforcement of the laws of the United States in that quarter.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

A Baptist Theological Seminary has just been opened at Fairmount, near Cincinnati, a new Gothic edifice having been erected for it, at a cost of $25,000. It is located on the summit of one of the highest hills in the vicinity of the city, and in full view of Cincinnati, Covington and Newport. Tuition is free to candidates for the ministry, and to approved applicants needing assistance an appropriation of $40 per annnm will be made by the Baptist Educational Society. The professors are all qualified ministers of the Gospel.

Rev. J. B. Burke, a Congregrational clergyman, recently from Scotland, who has been supplying the Methodist pulpit at Shelbourne Falls, Mass., for the past few months, has become a Baptist, and on a recent Sunday gave his reasons for his change of sentiments, at the Baptist Church in that place. He was then baptized by Rev. E. H. Gray, in the presence of a large concourse of people. He will be recognized as a Baptist minister, by public services.

Rev. Jean Vernier, having visited France and Switzerland for the purpose, has obtained two or three ministers of Christ, and five or six missionary schoolmasters, to labor among the French Catholics in Canada. A spirit of inquiry, says Rev. Mr. Wilkes, is awaking here and there among the more educated classes; the faith of some in Rome is shaken; the youth particularly, in instances not a few, are thoughtful and desirous to know the truth. "Surely, the Lord has purposes of mercy toward Popery-ridden French Canada."

"The people of Massachusetts," says Mr. Hotchkin, "think the 'Maine law' is too strict. But the Choctaws can put a stricter on a stricter, and still sustain it. It is now punishable with a fine of three dollars to bring a bottle of liquor into the nation. The penalty for the second offense is five dollars, and for the third ten dollars. These fines have been demanded and paid, principally the first. The next General Council will make the penalty for the first offense twenty-five dollars, and for the second, fifty. This shows some progress."

From reports presented at the Universalist General Convention held at Columbus, Ohio, last month, it appears that this denomination has at the present time in the United States, 1,097 societies, 836 houses of worship, 612 preachers, 20 periodicals, 10 academies or schools, 118 ecclesiastical associations, including State Conventions, Missionary, Tract and Educational Societies.

European News.

We have three days later news from Europe, a summary of which we give below.

The position of Eastern affairs remains unchanged. The declaration of war was to be read in all the Mosques on the 7th of October. Till the 25th of October was allowed for the Russian forces to evacuate the Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia. The commander of those forces has given notice that he will evacuate only when "the Porte shall have given to the Czar the moral satisfaction he demands." Meanwhile, if attacked, he will defend himself. Voluntary gifts of all descriptions continued to flow into the Turkish treasury. Jewels, money horses, houses and lands, to an immense amount, were offered for the national service. Eight thousand "Redifs" were armed, clothed, and equipped, from the proceeds of one day's offerings. Military preparations continue with unabated spirit. The Turkish steam-frigates Faizi, Bahri, Taif, Feridje and Medjedié, have been sent to Beyroot, to take on board 12,000 regulars of the army of Syria. Orders had been given to call out 50,000 more "Redifs," exclusive of the reserves. Of these 50,000, 18,000 were armed and equipped by the city of Constantinople. The whole enrolled themselves in one day, and within one week, arms, clothing and horses were provided. Twenty thousand Druses, irregulars, under their Chief, Cheibli, who so long withstood Mehemet Ali, were daily expected to join the army of Asia. One half of the Turkish fleet was about to leave for the Coast of Asia, between Trebizond and Batoum. Two battalions of Chasseurs, armed and drilled on the system of the Chasseurs de Vincennes, had been sent to Omar Pacha, and a third was about to leave for Batoum. Orders had been sent to the Governor of Adrianople to send, without the least delay, to Constantinople the Circassian Chief, Sefer Bey, who had been residing in the former city. Hazzan Jazidju had marched at the head of 4,000 horsemen for the army in Asia, and it was stated that after retaining a sufficient force in Egypt, Abbas Pacha can spare 150,000 more men to the Turkish aid. In short, every exertion was making; but, as yet, the last call on the enthusiasm of the Mussulmans, the unfurling of the Prophet's standard, had not been made, nor was it intended at present to make it. The Turkish force now in arms is estimated, though somewhat loosely, at 300,000 men—namely, 120,000 between the Danube and the Balkan, 15,000 in Bostna, 6,000 near Pristina, on the Servian frontier; 50,000, who will be mustered within 20 days at Adrianople, and from 80,000 to 100,000 men on the frontier of Asia.

A young Polish Jew named Wolowski had been apprehended near Shumla; and on his person was found treasonable correspondence with the Russians. He was brought before Omar Pacha, who gave orders to hang him.

A Parliamentary return just published shows that in the year ending 5th January last, Britain paid out of the public treasury, £90,784 sterling for bounty and expenses on captured negroes, in prevention of the Slave-trade.

The ship Dalhousia, from Gravesend, 13th, for Sydney, sunk on the 19th, off Beechy Head. Fifty-nine lives were lost.

It appears that Miss Cunningham, the lady who was imprisoned in Tuscany for distributing Protestant tracts, was so ambitious of martyrdom that when the order came for her release she refused to leave prison, and had actually to be turned out. A private source informs us that this lady, of the "Cunninghames of Ayrshire, Scotland," is a lineal descendant of the Reformer John Knox, and was consequently bound to emulate her illustrious ancestor. We do not give this statement of genealogy for fact. Her persecutors will be made the subject of discussion in Parliament.

The earthquake already reported to have occurred in Greece, on the night of the 29th Sept., was more violent than at first stated. Shocks continued at intervals from midnight till 4 o'clock in the morning. All that was left standing of Thebes was completely demolished. Many of the houses of Chalcia, as well as a part of the fortress, were overthrown. Smaller shocks continued to be felt till Oct. 7.

The greater part of the population of Achaia and Patras are reduced to destitution by the complete failure of the currant crop. Accounts say that the yield is not one-fifteenth of an average, and that the loss to Greece will be equal to 200,000,000 francs—a manifest exaggeration.

California News.

By way of New Orleans, we have California news to Oct. 16th. Time between San Francisco and New Orleans twenty days.

Mining is said to have been quite successful for a while past, and nearly three million dollars in gold dust is reported as on its way to New York.

Murders and outrages were occurring throughout the State to an alarming extent.

The city of Sonora was destroyed by fire Oct. 3, and the loss of property will amount to one and a half million of dollars.

John Mitchel, the Irish patriot, who recently escaped from Australia, arrived safely with his family at San Francisco on the 12th of October. He last came from the Sandwich Islands.

The Supreme Court of California has made an important decision, declaring valid all grants made in accordance with the Mexican law. The effect of this will be to oust hundreds from lots held by them for years, and restore them to the original grantees. It is considered a death-blow to the squatters, and will cause millions of property to change hands by a mere operation of law.

From the Sandwich Islands the news is highly important. Dr. Judd had been removed from the office of Minister of Finance, and Elisha H. Allen, late U. S. Consul, appointed in his place. A decided step had been taken towards annexation to the United States. The French and British Consuls had protested to the King against such an act, and the American Commissinoers had replied in a firm but dignified manner. This movement had caused the greatest excitement in the islands.

In Yale College this year there are 27 Theological, 38 Law, 41 Medical Students, and 45 Students in Philosophy and the Arts. There are in the Classical Course, 100 Seniors, 100 Juniors, 108 Sophomores, and 135 Freshmen—total, 594.

Extremes Meet.

They did yesterday (says the N. Y. Tribune) within a stone's throw of our Office, just by the railing of the Brick Church, east of the Park.

Two late residents of the Celestial Empire, with shaved heads and long cues, dressed in their peculiar Chinese costume, were squatted upon the sidewalk, making earnest gesticulations to the passers-by, to induce them to purchase cigars. "Buy a smoke. Buy a smoke." This was the extent of their accomplishment in the English language. Poor unfortunate beings, thrown by chance upon this overcrowded City, just as winter is setting in, with no ability to support themselves, with no words to help them on in their traffic beside those three ones, "buy a smoke," how are they to live? Theirs is an extreme case—it is a hard case, and it is a pity they have none to direct and help them in an effort of honest industry to support life.

While the words "buy a smoke" were still echoing through our brain, calling up a train of sad thoughts connected with these Orientals, we heard another voice at our elbow, "Buy one." We looked around; extremes had met. Here stood a couple of North American Aborigines, inviting us to buy a pair of moccasins. As chary of their words, if they knew more, as the Chinese, they simply said, "Buy one," and held out their merchandise with a mute appeal to our sympathy for a poor, trodden down, rum degraded people, who have sunk to their present state through the effect of their association with civilized, christianized conquerors.

Two Chinese men from the most ancient empire in the world; and two Indian women from the uncultivated forests of a country only discovered by white men in the life time of the great grandsires of both; meeting here in this great Babylon, the site of which was covered with woods, and was the home of the red man, at a period when all the forests of China had been cut down and the land cultivated. There is a subject for reflection in this contrast, which we leave the rest of mankind to pursue for themselves.

A Case of Hydrophobia.—A letter to the N. Y. Tribune, dated West Killingley, Ct., Oct. 24, tells the following sad story:—

Mr. S. H. Hopkins, late of Providence, R. I., I., was bitten by a dog, not known to be rabid, on the 22d of July last. Mr. H. and his friends had fears for some weeks, but after the lapse of about three months, they began to hope that the time of danger had past. While on a visit to the house of his brother-in-law, Mr. L. Warren, of this town, during the night of Friday, the 21st inst., he was taken ill, and soon was attacked with nausea and spasms. Nothing decided was discovered in his symptoms until Saturday morning, when a tumbler of water being presented, he found he could not receive it, and even the sight of water caused convulsions. Medical aid was called, and it was soon ascertained that his was a hopeless case of Hydrophobia. He became the subject of violent paroxysms, which were relieved by lucid intervals until the 23d inst., about 3 o'clock, P. M., when he expired. His age was about 27 years. His sufferings were indescribable, and such as to wear out and destroy a vigorous and very valuable young life in about 36 hours. His lucid seasons were remarkable for composure of mind and self-possession. He fully understood his case, made all necessary arrangements relative to his secular business, spoke cheerfully of his approaching end, took leave of his wife, and many other friends, who had gathered round him, frequently entreated them to be careful that he did not injure them during the fits, regretted that he could not avoid such contortions, and maintained a noble and Christian calmness to the end, which was peace.

Route to the Pacific.—From Central America, we have accounts of the negotiations between Mr. E. George Squier, as the agent of a Company of wealthy capitalists in this city, and the Government of San Salvador, with regard to a new channel of inter-oceanic communication across the territory of that State. This scheme has been for months in preparation, and seems to promise decided advantages over Nicaragua, Panama, Tehuantepec, Atrato, or any other of the various isthmus routes. The line on the Atlantic side is to begin at the Gulf of Amatique, or some other convenient harbor on the Bay of Honduras, and traverse the country, as directly as practicable, to the Gulf of Fonseca, on the Pacific. The distance from New York to the Atlantic depot of the road will be much less than the Tehuantepec terminus, to San Juan del Norte, or Aspinwall. The length of the road will be from one to two hundred miles; and the Gulf of Fonseca is far the best harbor on the Pacific, south of San Francisco. We are assured that, at a moderate calculation, the journey from New York to the California metropolis will be accomplished in less time by this route than by Vera Cruz, or even by Tehuantepec, supposing that line to be opened and worked with all possible success. Besides, the San Salvador route runs through a perfectly healthy as well as very beautiful country, where a road can be built without costing the lives of its laborers, and at much less expense than at Panama, Nicaragua, or Tehuantepec. Death from Spirit Rappings.—The Buffalo Courier chronicles another curious and melancholy instance of the effects of belief in the so-called doctrine of Spiritual Manifestations. It appears that some few months since a young man and woman in Evano, N. Y., upon being informed by a medium that it was the will of the "Spirits" that they should become man and wife, although scarcely acquainted with each other, went before a Justice and were married. The woman, whose health had already been impaired by the exciting influences of "spiritual manifestations," grew worse, and finally died. During her sickness she was attended by a spiritual physician, under whose direction she would stretch herself upon the ground, face downward, remaining in that posture hours at a time, for the purpose of "getting the electricity from the ground," and go through various other equally absurd performances. Subsequent to her death the body showed no symptoms of decay, and was kept for a week or more without burial, owing to fears which her friends entertained that she was not dead. At length her physician and spiritual friends quieted all doubt, by asserting that her spirit was too happy in the sphere where it had gone to return to the cares and pains incident to the flesh, and she was buried.

SUMMARY.

A Washington paper says that the Pension Bureau was, on the 1st inst., brought up to date, including Revolutionary cases. This is the first time, in many years, when the desks of all the employees of the office have been in such condition that they could dispose of any and all calls upon them instanter, as it were. Up to the 1st inst., more than 4,000 claims under the law of February 3, 1853, which grants pensions to the widows of Revolutioners who married subsequent to 1800, and to widows and orphans of those serving in the war of 1812, and the Mexican war, were examined. Of these, 2,720 have been allowed, 1,450 of them being Revolutionary cases, and 1,270 of the latter classes.

The Herman (Mo.) Wachenblatt speaks of the Wine harvest in that quarter as being all that the cultivators could ask. No estimate has yet been made of the quantity made, but it is already clear that it is large. In some vineyards the grapes have ripened slowly, and thus required a great amount of labor in the gathering; in others, almost all at once, but in both cases the fruit has been of an extra quality. Most of the farmers in that neighborhood now devote an acre or two to Wine, and find the progts about equal to those of the rest of their farms. The quality of the Wine this year is excellent.

The farmers in Allegany County, N. Y., have been favored with fine weather to secure the fall crops, which have all been secured in good order. Corn in that County is good—near a third better than the previous year. The Potato crop is fair; the rot has injured some crops, mostly on moist or wettish land. Those planted on dry gravel land are not much injured. The average yield is about one hundred bushels per acre, of sound tubers. The Wheat crop is a fair average crop. Oats fair. Some pieces, late sown, were injured by drouth; average yield probably 35 bushels per acre.

It should be generally known, that any document which contains writing over an erasure made with a knife or in any other manner by which the word or words originally there are prevented from being understood, is deemed invalid in the Executive Departments at Washington, until satisfactory explanation shall have beed made; and nothing except positive legal testimony is taken for such explanation.

The following is an abstract of the business of the Pension Office for the last month, (October,) 1853. Number of bounty land claims examined, 9,163; warrants issued, 2,481; pension and half-pay claims examined, 1,616; pension and half-pay certificates issued, 574; letters received, briefed and registered, 4,369; written, 3,916; recorded, 2,952; copied, 1,031; sent from Pension Office, 10,312.

A letter to the editors of the New Orleans Picayune, says the orange crop in the parish of Plaquemine will far exceed the crop of last season. The trees are so much loaded that branches are often broken under the weight of the precious fruit. Farmers generally ask from eighteen to twenty-five dollars per thousand for their crops.

The Lands occupied by the Hungarian exiles at New Buda, Iowa, granted to them by President Fillmore, subject to the approval of Congress, were recently about to be put up at public sale by the United States officers, but the exiles asked for delay until the next Congress could have time to act, and it has been allowed to them.

A London tradesman has taken out a patent for a new sort of hat, with ventilation in the sides of the crown, near the band, and not by a hole in the top. Baldness is frequently produced by our close hats, which, in a hot day, operate like a tight cylinder for receiving and condensing hot air. Headache, too, is a common effect of tight and unventilating hats.

Said a preacher in one of the city stations recently, at the close of the morning sermon, "Brethren, I have been an itinerant preacher for over twenty years, and I never knew a revival to begin in any church without first having a revival in the prayer-meeting. We must begin there; get our souls, as Christians, revived and rebaptized, and then the work will go forward."

Fruit dealers in this City have sent agents through the western part of this State to buy up all the good apples they can procure at reasonable rates. We hear they are paying fifty cents a bushel. We suppose they will charge three or four times that when they get them here. Farmers of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, etc., who have a good apple crop, may as well understand, that fruit is scarce and dear in this City.

A Washington report states that the Secretary of the Treasury had purchased of the holders in Holland the five per cent. loan of the Cities of Washington and Georgetown, amounting to $650,000, averaging six years to run, at 12 per cent. premium. What country was ever heard of, since the creation, excepting this, which paid off its national debt before maturity at 12 to 22 per cent. premium?

The Cholera seems to be quite fatal on board of emigrant ships from European ports to New York. The London packet ship Prince Albert arrived Thursday with 378 passengers, having lost thirty-five of the passengers and one of the crew on the passage, of Cholera—had five sick on arrival. The ship Forest King, from Liverpool, arrived on the 1st, with 589 passengers; lost thirty-nine by Cholera on the passage.

The schooner S. P. Burnham, from the Bay of St. Lawrence, bound to Gloucester, was struck by a heavy sea off Casina during the late gale, thrown on her beam ends, and Captain Atwood and four of the crew were washed overboard and drowned. The schooner lost her foremast, but the balance of the crew managed to get her into Tremont, Maine.

Jonathan Tibbetts, of Kingston, N. H., cruelly beat his wife and child on Sunday, while in a state of intoxication. She threatened to leave the house, when he told her he would shoot her if she did. She did leave, and he seized a gun and shot at her, twenty shot taking effect on her and her child. Their recovery is very doubtful. The murderer has been arrested.

While the U. S. Commissioner at Cincinnati, was recently giving a decision upon a motion for continuance in the case of Lewis, an alleged fugitive slave, the negro slipped out of court and escaped, the audience cheering as he left the door.

The descendants of Peter Oliver, Gov. Hutchinson, and one other ancient New England family, now residing in England, are said to be making ample legal preparations, through counsel in New York, for claiming real estate in Boston to the amount of $15,000,000. It embraces all the land from the corner of Milk street, across Fort Hill to Summer street, on the line of what was once known as Cow Lane, to the water. They also claim the whole of Lechmere Point, now East Cambridge.

There are published in California, says the Marysville Express, thirty-eight newspapers, twelve of which are daily, one tri-weekly, two semi-weekly, and the balance are weekly. Sixteen of these are printed in San Francisco, four in Sacramento, two in Marysville, two in Stockton, and two in Placerville. Three are printed in foreign languages, and two devoted to two different languages. Among them four are called Journals, eight of them Heralds, and two Republicans. Total weekly circulation, 160,000.

A dispatch dated Washington, Oct. 30, 1853, says: The Treasurer's statement exhibits the net amount of money at all the Sub-Treasuries and Mints, subject to draft, to be about $26,000,000. In New York, $7,700,000; at Boston, upward of $3,000,000; at Philadelphia, nearly $753,000; at Philadelphia Mint, upwards of $7,800,000; at New Orleans, upward of $1,100,000; at New Orleans Mint, upward of $3,200,000; at St. Louis, upward of $1,300,000; at San Francisco, upward of $1,400,000.

A daughter of Michael Youngs, aged four and one-fifth years, of Sussex, New Jersey, fell upon the floor with a needle two and a quarter inches long sticking in its apron, and which was partly driven into its chest and broken off. The doctor could not find the piece of the needle, and the child lingered in great agony for four weeks, when it died, and a post-mortem examination revealed a piece of the needle, one inch and a quarter long, lying loose in a large collection of matter entirely within the heart's substance.

The steam-tug Ajax left New York for Boston, just before the recent severe gale, for the purpose of towing a new clipper-ship to New York. After the gale commenced, she was seen in a crippled condition, since which no tidings have been received from her. It is generally believed that she foundered at sea, and was lost, with her entire crew of thirteen persons.

The New York Reformer says that at the cattle show and fair, held at Canton, St. Lawrence county, a spirited horse was exhibited, which, on passing an old man, was struck by him with his cane on the flank. The horse returned the blow with his heels with compound interest, and with such violence that the man died of the injury in about fifteen minutes.

The New York Express, in an article relating to the chiffoniers of New York, says: "We have seen able-bodied persons here gathering up the bits of cigars thrown into the gutters by the smokers, to be made, we suppose, into chewing tobacco for those who revel in the use of tobacco." Think of that, ye who are wedded to the weed!

Twenty-four hundred claims have been made upon the Department for pensions under the act of February 3d, 1853, granting pensions to the widows of officers and soldiers of the Revolution who were married subsequent to the year 1800. When the law was enacted it was generally supposed that there would not be more than three hundred claims in all.

The first mate and four of the crew of the British ship Liverpool have arrived at New Orleans. They report that the ship, which was bound from Shields to New York, foundered at sea, carrying down with her the Captain, (Williams,) his wife, a lady passenger, and thirteen of the crew.

A new-wheel barrow has been invented. It is very wonderful it has not been thought of before. The wheel is placed under the center, so that none of the weight of the load rests upon the hands. A man can wheel twice the usual weight.

Under the head of "Priestcraft," the Cincinnati Times states that "two Catholic Priests, at the Dayton Fair, were detected and fined for defrauding the Fair by passing their badges from the inside to their friends outside, through a knot-hole in the fence of the enclosure."

Chicago papers bring us the sad news of the death of Annie, the last of Mr. De Wolf's four children, who suffered from the dreadful accident on board the Bay State.

The first premium on woolen yarns, at the Plymouth County Agricultural Fair, was awarded to Miss Betsey Holmes of Marshfield, a lady 95 years of age.

An Excursion Train left Manchester, N. H., at 4½ P. M. on Wednesday, for the Crystal Palace, viâ Norwich, Ct., reaching this city Thursday morning. Fare for the trip, $5.

A party of six from Machias, recently visited Lake Sabio on a cranberry excursion, and after three days absence returned with sixty-five bushels of clean cranberries.

Mayor Park, of Alleghany City, and all his police, have been arrested and holden to bail for trial for compounding felonies.

DIED,

In Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., Oct. 26th, Wm. H. Hull, son of Daniel P. and Susan Hull, in the twenty-first year of his age. Brother Hull became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin about a year ago, since which time he has given good evidence of a Christian hope, by great faithfulness in the cause of his blessed Redeemer. Consumption, the cause of this early death, began its sure work more than three years ago, while Mr. Hull was attending school at the DeRuyter Institute. He was thus obliged to leave his favorite studies, though reluctantly, indulging the vain hope of resuming them again. As a scholar, this young man enjoyed a reputation such as few of equal opportunities have ever merited. His design was to have entered college at the expiration of his academic studies, begun so prosperously, but closed so prematurely. Thus it is, that the high hopes of his early associates have been cut off; for the frost of death has nipped this tender bud, ere it had expanded into the blooming flower. Society has lost one of her noblest young men, whose heart beat with a generous philanthropy, whose countenance glowed with inspiring emulation as he prepared to enter the lists of competitors for the prizes of life. The church has followed to the grave one who gave her the pledge of his protection and support, and evidence of his ability to defend her sacred interests. But especially are the relatives of the deceased bereaved, in the death of one they had learned to love for his many virtues. Yet they mourn not as those without hope. He was patient in sickness, and triumphant in death.

"Peaceful be thy silent slumber,
 Peaceful in the grave so low;
Thou no more shalt join our number,
 Thou no more our songs shalt know.
"Yet again we hope to meet thee,
 When the day of life is fled;
Then, in heaven, with joy to greet thee,
 Where no farewell tear is shed." L. C. R.

In Plainfield, N. J., Oct. 29th, Emily Salter, daughter of Voorhes and Margaret Randolph, aged eight years, seven months, and twenty-six days. Her disease was enlargement of the heart. She left satisfactory evidence that she was prepared for her early fate, by possessing the love of God in her heart. L. C.

Miscellaneous.

The Japan Expedition.

The North China Mail of August 11th gives the following authentic and interesting particulars of Commodore Perry's expedition to Japan :—

The squadron, consisting of the steam-frigates Susquehannah and Mississippi, and the sloops of war Plymouth and Saratoga, sailed from the harbor of Napa-kiang, in Loo-Choo, on the 2d of July. On the morning of the 8th they made Cape Idzu, near the southern entrance of the Bay of Jeddo, and, sailing directly up the Bay, anchored in the afternoon off the town of Uraga, more than a mile beyond the former anchorage of the Morrison and Columbus. The appearance of the steamers—the first ever seen in Japanese waters—with the other vessels in tow, moving with all sails furled, at the rate of nine or ten knots an hour, appeared to produce considerable sensation among the Japanese, and all the trading junks, with which the bay was crowded, carefully kept out of their way.

As the vessels were coming to anchor, two shells or rockets were fired into the air from a battery about a mile distant, but apparently as a signal, and [illegible] a token of hostility. Several Government boats immediatly came off, and endeavored to put on board the vessel the usual notification to foreigners, warning them to depart. They were not received, however, and the Deputy Governor of Uraga, who was the only person allowed to come on board, was notified that if the Japanese authorities endeavored to surround the ships with the usual cordon of boats, it would lead to very serious consequences. After boats, nevertheless, lingered round the Susquehannah, but the sight of some warlike preparations satisfied them that Commodore Perry was in earnest, and they quickly retired. During the stay of the squadron in the bay [illegible] never afterward visited by any boats except those containing the officials through whom the negotiations were carried on. The next morning, Yezaimon, the Governor of Uraga, and a nobleman of the third rank came off, and, after ascertaining the object of the visit, asked for time to dispatch an express to Jeddo, in order to communicate the information, and obtain instructions how [illegible]. During the three days which elapsed before the answer arrived, the Mississippi made a trip of about ten miles further up the bay, finding everywhere deep soundings. Beyond the promontory of Uraga, a point which no foreign vessel had passed before, she discovered a large and beautiful bight, which is perfectly land-locked, and offered the most secure and commodious anchorage. She was followed at a distance by a number of Government boats, but none of them attempted to interfere with her, or with the cutters of the different vessels which were sounding in advance of her. The presence of the squadron appeared to cause no interruption to the local commerce, for the bay was at all times filled with large junks and hundreds of small craft, passing up and down.

On Tuesday, the 12th, an answer from Jeddo, stating that the Emperor had appointed an officer of the highest rank to proceed to Uraga and receive the letter of the President of the United States, and satisfactory proofs having been given to Commodore Perry that this appointment came directly from the Imperial Government, it was arranged that the interview should take place on the morning of the 14th. We understand that the Commodore was first informed on his arrival, that Nagassaki was the proper point from which to negotiate with the Japanese Government, but he replied that a request to proceed thither would be an insult to his Government.

The Japanese selected the small town of Gori-hama, about three miles south of Uraga, for the interview. On the morning of the 14th the Susquehannah and the Mississippi took up a position off the town, and lay with their broadsides to the shore. The Governor and Deputy Governor of Uraga, with the Commandant of the military forces, came off to accompany the Commodore to the landing place. Three houses had been erected by the Japanese, one of which was prepared for the interview, while the other two were apparently intended for the accommodation of the Princes who had come from Jeddo to receive the letter. The officers and men detailed to accompany Commodore Perry, amounted to about 400, while the force of the Japanese was variously estimated at from 5,000 to 7,000. Their foremost lines extended around the head of the bight for a distance of nearly a mile, and with their number of scarlet pennons, and banners of various devices, presented a novel and beautiful show. The Commodore was escorted, with the American colors flying, and the bands playing the National "Hail Columbia," to the house of reception. Here he was received by the Prince of Idzu, first Councilor of the Emperor, who was accompanied by the Prince of Iwami. The letter of the President and Commodore Perry's letter of credence were formally delivered, and an official receipt given in return by the two Princes. The interview then terminated, as the latter were not empowered to enter into any negotiations. The Commodore stated, however, that in order to give the Japanese Government ample time for deliberation, he would depart in three or four days and return in a few months to receive the reply. We may here mention that this was the only instance in which Commodore Perry met any of the Japanese officials in person. The Governor of Uraga was not received by him, as not being of equal rank, and all the previous and subsequent negotiations with the Japanese, were carried on through the officers of the Commodore's staff and Commander Buchanan of the Susquehannah.

The Governor and Deputy Governor of Uraga, with their interpreters and attendants, after the interview, were treated to a trip in the Susquehannah, where they witnessed for the first time the performance of the steam engine. After leaving them at Utaga, the squadron stood across the bay toward the Eastern shore, and then proceeded to the point reached by the Mississippi, about ten miles above Uraga. On the following day Commodore Perry, in the Mississippi, went about ten miles beyond this, making a total distance of 20 miles beyond the limit of previous exploration. From the deck of the frigate a crowd of shipping was seen seven or eight miles to the northward; and, from the number of junks continually going and coming, it was evident that this was the anchorage in front of the capital. The officers of the Susquehanna and Mississippi speak with admiration of the beauty of the shores, and the rich cultivation and luxuriant vegetation which they everywhere witnessed The natives with whom they came in contact were friendly in their demeanor, and the Governor of Uraga is spoken of as a model of refinement and good breeding.

The day before the departure of the squadron, the Governor went on board the Susquehannah, taking with him a number of presents, consisting of articles of lackered ware and other Japanese manufactures. A suitable collection of presents was prepared in return; and, in spite of his declaration that it was contrary to Japanese law, he was obliged to accept them in order to prevent the rejection of his own. He afterward brought off a large quantity of poultry for the vessel, and received in return a large box of choice American garden seeds, his acceptance of the presents on the previous visit having, to his great joy, been sanctioned by his superiors. Notwithstanding the repeated concessions which the Japanese made to the demands of Commodore Perry, they are said to have been very friendly in their intercourse, and to have taken their final leave with a show of real regret.

The squadron sailed from the Bay of Jeddo on the 17th, and, after encountering a severe gale during the 21st and 22d, arrived at Loo-Choo on the 25th of July, and the two steam frigates returned to Hong-Kong on the evening of the 7th of August."

Napoleon's Attempt to Commit Suicide.

In Montholon's history of the captivity of Napoleon at St. Helena, it is recorded that he twice attempted self-destruction, once early in his career, and again in 1815. On the first occasion, his life was saved by Demasis, a former comrade in an artillery regiment. Napoleon was then in Paris, depressed and suffering with illness. His mother having fled from Corsica, was at Marseilles, without means of subsistence, and had written to him for aid. Napoleon had nothing but an assignat of an hundred sous. Relating this adventure to Montholon, Napoleon says :—

"In a state of dejection, I went out, as if urged to suicide by an animal instinct, and walked along the quays, feeling my weakness, but unable to conquer it. In a few more moments I should have thrown myself into the water, when I ran against an individual dressed like a simple mechanic, and who recognized me, and threw himself on my neck, and cried, 'Is it you, Napoleon? What joy to see you again!' It was Demasis, a former comrade in the artillery regiment. He had emigrated, and had returned to France in disguise to see his aged mother. He was about to go, when stopping he said, 'What is the matter? You do not listen to me. You did not seem glad to see me. What misfortune threatens? You look to me like a man about to kill himself.'"

This direct appeal awoke Napoleon's feelings, and he told him everything. 'Is that all?' said he, opening his coarse waistcoat—and detatching a belt, he added, 'Here are thirty thousand francs in gold; take them and save your mother.' 'I cannot,' said Napoleon, 'to this day, explain to myself my motives for so doing, but I seized the gold as if by a convulsive movement, and ran like a madman to send it to my mother. It was not until it was out of my hands that I thought of what I had done. I hastened back to the spot where I had left Demasis, but he was no longer there. For several days I went out in the morning and returned not until evening, searching every place where I hoped to find him.'

The end of this romance is as eccentric as the beginning. For fifteen years Napoleon saw no more of his creditor. At the end of that time he discovered him, and asked, 'why he had not applied to the Emperor.' The answer was, that he had no necessity for the money, but was afraid of being compelled to quit his retirement, where he lived happily practicing horticulture.

Napoleon now paid his debt, as may be presumed, magnificently; made him accept three hundred thousand francs, as a reimbursement from the Emperor for the thirty thousand lent to the subaltern of artillery; and besides made him director general of the gardens of the crown, with a salary of thirty thousand francs. He also gave a government place to his brother.

In April, 1815, when Napoleon was at the head of his army, preparing to attack the allies, his Marshals demanded an interview with him. They were opposed to his plan of operation, and looked upon an attempt to rëenter Paris as hopeless. They proposed that he should abdicate in favor of his son. This was also the advice of the Emperor Alexander. Napoleon did as was proposed; but Marmont and his army had surrendered on that day. After this the allies rejected all negotiation. The propositions and offers of Napoleon to his officers and soldiers were unheeded by them, and he at length signed an uneqivocal abdication for himself and family. This led to a second attempt on his own life. He thus narrates it :—

'From the time of the retreat from Russia,' said he, 'I had constantly carried in a silken bag, a portion of a poisonous powder which Ivan had prepared by my orders, when I was in fear of being carried off by the Cossacks. My life no longer belonged to my country; the events of the last few days had again rendered me master of it. Why should I endure so much suffering? And who knows that my death may not place the crown upon the head of my son? France was saved. I hesitated no longer, but leaning from my bed, mixed the poison in a little water, and drank it with a sort of happiness. But time had taken away its strength; fearful pains drew forth some groans from me; they were heard and medical assistance arrived. It was not Heaven's will that I should die so soon. St. Helena was my destiny.'

EDUCATION OF IDIOTS.—It was a mother's love that proved the capacity of the idiot for improvement. Before any scientific experiments had been made in the education of idiots, a lady in Massachusetts, occupying a high position in society, and whose husband was one of the prominent public men of that State, had two children, both idiotic. When the terrible conviction of this fact was first forced upon her, she gave up all society, removed from the city to a retired country place, and devoted the whole energies of her nature, stimulated by the strong, undying affection of a mother, to their improvement, The result was that they improved both physically and mentally, were able to go to school, received prizes for scholarship, and finally graduated at one of our best Colleges, receiving some of the honors which are bestowed on the few. If these children had received the ordinary treatment, they would have passed through life wretched objects of pity and disgust, instead of being respected members of society.

They all belong to Me.

BY ELIZA COOK.

There are riches without measure,
Scattered thickly o'er the land;
There are heaps and heaps of treasure,
Bright, and beautiful, and grand;
There are forests, there are mountains,
There are meadows, there are rills,
Forming everlasting fountains
In the bosoms of the hills;
There are birds, and there are flowers.
The fairest things that be—
And these great and joyous dowers,
Oh! 'they all belong to me.'

There are golden acres blending
In the light of harvest rays;
There are garland branches bending
With the breath of June's sweet days;
There are pasture grasses blowing
In the dewy moorland shade,
There are herds of cattle lowing
In the midst of bloom and blade;
There are noble elms that quiver,
As the gale comes full and free,
There are alders by the river,
And 'they all belong to me.'

I care not who may reckon
The wheat piled up in sacks,
Nor who has power to beckon
The woodman with his axe;
I care not who holds leases
Of the upland or the dell,
Nor who may count the fleeces
When the flocks are fit to sell.
While there's beauty none can barter
By the greensward and the tree;
Claim who will, by seal or charter,
Yet 'they all belong to me.'

There's the thick and dingled cover
Where the hare and pheasant play,
There are sheets of rosy clover,
There are hedges crowned with May;
There are vines, all dark and gushing,
There are orchards ripe and red,
There are herds of wild deer crushing
The heath-bells as they tread.
And ye, who count in money
The value these may be,
Your hives but hold my honey,
For 'they all belong to me.'

Ye cannot shut the tree in,
Ye cannot hide the hills,
Ye cannot wall the sea in,
Ye cannot choke the rills;
The corn will only nestle
In the broad arms of the sky,
The clover crop must wrestle
With the common wind, or die.
And while these stores of treasure
Are spread where I may see,
By God's high, bounteous pleasure,
'They all belong to me.'

What care I for the profit
The stricken stem may yield?
I have the shadow of it
While upright in the field!
What reck I of the riches
The mill-streams gather fast,
While I bask in shady niches,
And see the brook go past?
What reck I who has title
To the wildest lands that be;
They are mine, without requital,
God gave them all to me.

Oh! privilege and blessing
To find I ever own
What great ones, in possessing,
Imagine theirs alone!
Oh! glory to the Maker,
Who gave such boon to hold,
Who made me free partaker
Where others buy with gold!
For while the woods and mountains
Stand up where I can see,
While God unlocks the fountains,
'They all belong to me.'

Photographic Forgery.

A discovery has recently been made at the Bank of England, which will cause, it is understood, a great change to be speedily effected in the character and general appearance of the notes issued by that corporation. It has just been ascertained that by means of photography fac-similes can be obtained, by a skillful operator, with the greatest facility; and that fraudulent copies of Bank notes thus obtained would pass muster even with some of the most experienced judges. We are not aware by what means the suspicions of the authorities of the Bank were originally excited on this important subject. It is stated, however, that they were first caused by one of these fraudulent notes having been exchanged for gold "over the counter," its spurious character having escaped the generally closely scrutinizing eyes of the cashiers in that department.

Under the impression, from certain indications which manifested themselves on the note, that it had been fabricated by photographic agency, experiments were made by one of the most eminent and experienced photographers in the metropolis, (whose aid was called into requisition by the Bank authorities,) when it was clearly proved, by the results of those experiments, that the spurious note had been manufactured by the means suspected, viz., photography. So close was the resemblance between the spurious note (thus experimentally obtained) and the genuine one (whence the copy was taken by the photographer alluded to) that not only were the signature and the private marks (the latter known only to the Bank officials) imitated with the closest accuracy, but the very watermark itself, in all its integrity, was as clearly and closely defined as the other more prominent characteristics of the genuine document.

The process adopted to produce these effects is well known to all photographers as "the wax paper process." The photographic thin negative paper, after having been prepared with wax, and then rendered sensitive by the usual method, (which need not be described here,) is then in a fit state to receive the impression from the genuine note, the printing, the signature, and the watermark, and, in fact, every mark, (however minute, which appears on the face of the note,) being clearly and distinctly traced and defined. This is termed the "negative," and from this "negative," obtained by such an extremely simple method, when adopted by a skillful manipulator, "positives" (exact fac-similes of the note itself) might be multiplied by means of sun-printing, to any extent.

We understand that the Directors of the Bank of England, in order most effectually to put a stop to the possibility of frauds being perpetrated to so inconvenient and alarming an extent, by photographic agency, have determined, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be effected, and with the least possible delay, to entirely alter the color of the paper on which their notes are produced, as well as change the color of the ink used in printing them, and substitute a widely different shade. From inquiries they have caused to be made, they have ascertained that if their notes be printed on a yellow tinged paper, in blue ink, it would be impossible to transfer fac-similes to photographic negative wax paper, (rendered sensitive by being saturated with a solution of the nitrate of silver and other chemicals,) from which the imitations of the genuine notes are obtained.

Another plan, to which the attention of the Bank authorities may be called, and which would be equally efficacious in putting an end to the nefarious system referred to, would be to have a few words, or some ornamental devices, struck off on the back of the genuine notes. These words or devices, by the process of sun-printing, would all be transferred to the front of the imitation note, and thus the attempts of the fraudulent to plunder the unwary would be entirely foiled.

The Sultan of Turkey.

Bayard Taylor, in a recent letter, gives the following description of the Sultan of Turkey :—

"Sultan Abdul-Medjid is a man about 30, though he looks older. He has a mild, amiable, weak face, dark eyes, a prominent nose, and short, dark brown mustache and beard. His face is thin, and wrinkles are already making their appearance about the corners of his mouth and eyes. But for a certain vacancy of expression, he would be called a handsome man. He sits on his horse with much ease and grace, though there is a slight stoop in his shoulders. His legs are crooked, owing to which cause he appears awkward when on his feet, though he wears a long cloak to conceal his deformity. Indulgence has weakened a constitution naturally not strong, and increased that mildness which has now become a defect in his character. He was dressed in a style of the utmost richness and elegance. He wore a red Turkish fez, with an immense rosette of brilliants, on a long, floating plume of bird of paradise feathers. The diamond in the center of the rosette is of unusual size; it was picked up some years ago, in the Hippodrome, and probably belonged to the treasury of the Greek Emperors. The breast and collar of his coat were one mass of diamonds, and sparkled in the early sun with a thousand rainbow gleams. His mantle of dark blue cloth hung to his knees, concealing the deformity of his legs. He wore white pantaloons, white kid gloves, and patent leather boots, thrust into his golden stirrups."

How Much Sleep?

"Show us a man who sleeps twelve hours," says a cotemporary, "and we will show you a blockhead." The meaning of the writer, as we gather from the rest of his article, is that four or five hours sleep is sufficient for any man. This, however, is an error. Differences of constitution require different quantities of sleep, for while one person is heathy on five hours sleep, another requires eight. Generally speaking, individuals in whom the nervous organization predominates, need the largest amount of sleep; the wear and tear of brain being so great while they are awake, that a proportionate excess of rest is demanded. Overtasking themselves without adequate sleep, is to such persons premature death; for neuralgia, if not insanity, is sure to intervene, followed eventually by loss of life. For this class of individuals to endeovor to do with as little sleep as those differently constituted, is like expecting a cistern, fed by periodical rains only, to yield as inexhaustible supplies of water as a hydrant supplied from a public aqueduct. It is looking for crops, when nothing has been put on the land. It is exhausting vitality, in a word, and allowing no time for recuperation.

There are some persons, fortunately constituted, who, with a high nervous organization, yet require comparatively little sleep. Brougham is a living instance. Napoleon was a still more remarkable example. The great Emperor rarely slept five hours. In truth, he owed his wonderful success as much to his capacity to endure fatigue, as to his genius, for he could outwork two ordinary men, if not more. Yet after periods of immense and protracted exertion, he would sleep for nearly a day. Bourrienne, his secretary, relates that after Napoleon returned from Russia, he slept eighteen hours without waking. Very few intellectual men, however, could have performed Napoleon's quantity of work, at any time, with so little sleep. Laboring with the brain is even more exhausting than laboring with the muscles, and consequently demands as much repose, for purposes of recuperation.

Nevertheless there are persons with whom sleep has become a disease. They rise late dose after dinner, nod in the evening, and in fact, may be said never to be more than half awake. Such people kill themselves in the end, as surely as if they had been deprived of needed sleep; for every vital function becomes torpid, life stagnates, and death at last carries off the victim. LARGE LUMP OF COAL.—The citizens of Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, have recently forworded for the Crystal Palace, four columns of anthracite coal from four overlying seams in the Wyoming valley, within an area of three miles of their borough. Three columns are of the following dimensions :—

1. A single block 3 feet in height by $2\frac{7}{8}$ feet square, from the upper or three foot stratum, and designed as are all the different columns, to show the thickness of that vein.
2. A column in two sections measuring six feet and a half high, the thickness of the seam from which it is taken.
3. A column in three sections nine and a half feet in height, the thickness of that seam.
4. A column in five benches or sections measuring thirty (30) feet in height, showing the thickness of the vein or stratum from which they are taken.
5. A specimen of coal weighing about eleven (11) tuns taken from the thirty foot seam, showing the fracture of the coal and its pure and excellent quality.
6. Various specimens of smaller dimensions from the same (30 foot) seam of coal.

THE WORLD A TRIBUNAL.—A man passes for that he is worth. Very idle is all curiosity concerning other people's estimate of us, and all fear of remaining unknown is not less so. If a man know that he can do anything, that he can do it better than any one else, he has a pledge of the acknowledgment of that fact by all persons. The world is full of judgment days, and into every assembly that a man enters, in every action he attempts, he is guaged and stamped. In every troop of boys that whoop and run in each yard and square, a new comer is as well and accurately weighed in the course of a few days, and stamped with his right number, as if he had undergone a formal trial of his strength, speed, and temper. A stranger comes from a distant school, with better dress, with trinkets in his pockets, with airs and pretensions. An older boy says to himself, "It's no use; we shall find him out to-morrow,"

THE LIGHTNING.—It may go far to encourage some timid people who are alarmed at lightning, to state the doctrine of chances. As a general thing, the lightning does not strike within the space of a square mile more than once a year. If a person is a rod distant he is seldom if ever killed. Now, there are 70,400 square rods in a mile; and if the lightning struck rod after rod, it would take one hundred and ninety years to go over it; but it smites here and there; and that it will smite any special rod there is not more than one chance to a hundred billion. Again, other things being equal, the chance diminishes, as it regards a low object, as the difference between the square of its height and that of a lower, so that with a person six feet, and a tree sixty feet, there is but one chance out of 3564 of the person's being struck. If he will go close to a tree, or in a house without a rod, his danger is proportionately increased. Again, objects non-conductors when dry become good conductors wet. A dry silk umbrella, if not tipped with a metalic substance, will ward off the lightning; but if wet, not. Get lightning rods for your houses, and see to it that the fastenings be much smaller than the rods, that the rods enter the earth, and fear not the "red artillery."

ANNOINTING WITH OIL.—Professor Simpson, of Edinburgh, has been the means of bringing to light a curious corroboration of the sanitary value of the ancient practice of anointing with oil. It appears that the learned Professor, when visiting the manufacturing town of Galashiels, was casually informed that the workers in the wool mill in that place were exempt from the attacks of consumption and scrofula. On inquiring of the medicinal men in the vicinity, the truth of the statement was confirmed, and it was then deemed expedient to pursue investigations on a broader scale. Communications were accordingly sent to physicians, residing in Dunfermline, Alloa, Tillicoutry, Inverness, and other Districts, where wool mills are in operation; and in the case of all it was ascertained that similar immunity was enjoyed from the fatal diseases mentioned. It further appeared that in some of the localities scarlatina had been added to the list; and also, that employment in the mills not only preserved the health, but children of delicate constitutions were sent to the wool workers for the express purpose of acquiring strength, a result in almost every instance attained.

VARIETY.

Few of our readers, perhaps, are aware that the human body falls asleep by degrees. According to M. Cabins, a French physiologist, "the muscles of the legs and arms lose their power before those which support the head; and these last sooner than those which support the back, and he illustrates this by cases of persons who sleep on horseback, or while they are standing or walking." He conceives that the sense of sight sleeps first; then the sense of taste; next the sense of smell; next tha t of hearing; and lastly that of touch. He maintains, also, that the viscera fall asleep, one after another, and sleep with different degrees of soundness.

The more a man accomplishes, the more he may. An active tool never grows rusty. You always find the most enterprising the most busy. Men of industry start our railroads, our steamships, machine shops, and our factories. We go for activity—in body, in mind, in everything. Keep all things in motion. We would rather have death find us breasting a whirpool than sneaking from a cloud.

There is something sublime in the movements of a locomotive—a veritable presence of power and mightiness—that even throws a prestige around the very fire stokers. We have gazed at Niagara, pitched clam-shells down Vesuvius, but neither of these things fills us with a tithe of that awe we always experience in seeing the red-eyed locomotive darting through the dark at the rate of fifty miles an hour.

The Forest City says, we once heard Ex-Senator Tom. Corwin remark that when "he first entered an office to study law, he was the subject of ridicule, for every student in town, on account of his homespun dress," but, added he, "I have lived to see every one of them ten times as ragged as I was at that time —and why? I was economical—they spendthrifts."

While a prominent temperance orator was recently speaking at Cleveland, he was asked, "What shall we do with all the grain that is now required for distilling?" "Feed the drunkard's wife and children with it; they have gone hungry long enough," was the ready reply.

The true secret of earthly happiness is to enjoy pleasures as they arise; for the man who can keep his eye upon the bright present, while it is bright, takes the cup of sweetness prepared for him; but we are prone to look forward to the dark objects while we should be enjoying those that are more agreeable.

The Catholics of California have prepared a gold ring for Dr. Newman. It is described as "a large plain ring, of great thickness, having the nugget, in its original grotesque shape, on the place where the brilliants of a ring are usually set." It weighs more than seventeen ounces, and is valued at $500.

So long as man tampers with intoxicating drinks, so long does he justify the manufacture and the sale in large and small quantities; and so long as it is sold must the use of it be abused, and use is the accompaniment of temptation.

C. G. Goodrich, Esq., writes to the Country Gentleman, that eggs may be preserved for almost any length of time in lime water. A pint of lime thrown into a barrel of water is sufficient. The eggs will at first float upon the top of the water, but will gradually sink to the bottom.

Dr. Tobert de Lambelle, a distinguished physician of Paris, announces that a shock of electricity, given to a patient dying from the effects of chloroform, immediately counteracts its influence and returns the sufferer to life.

The Lutheran Observer says there are two curses from which every church ought to be free; the one is A DEBT, and the other is A FUND. The latter is the greater of the two, but we ought to aim at deliverance from both.

It is said that since the origin of the Baptist mission in Germany, nine thousand persons have been baptized into the fellowship of the Gospel.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

THE WORK TO BE DONE—NO. 4

"Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtain of thy habitation; spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes." Isaiah 54: 2

In applying this passage to the Jews after their return out of captivity, we see the truth of the increase of their numbers after being settled again in their own land. According to the promise given to Abraham, they multiplied greatly. We are told, that the number who first came out of Babylon was forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty. Ezra 2: 64. Only about one fifteenth part as many as came up out of Egypt. There was a continued immigration to them afterwards, but not in such large numbers. About five hundred years afterward a calculation was made, according to the number of paschal lambs, and allowing ten to a lamb, would make the number 3,000,000. Josephus says they numbered 2,700,000.

But this passage will apply to the gospel Church. Previous to the introduction of the gospel, the Church of God was confined to a very small compass, and God's children were broken and scattered. They were gathered from that low, scattered condition, by the preaching of the everlasting gospel, and the establishing of the Christian Church. Immediately after the dawn of the gospel, multitudes were converted from idol worship, and from Jewish tradition, to the living and true God. Those who were sealed, of the tribes of Israel, were but a remnant in comparison with the multitudes of that nation, and those from the Gentiles were more than could be numbered. Rev. 7: 9. The increase of the Church has ever been the joy of her children, and for that they should labor and toil, for in heaven they partake of the same joy when sinners repent.

The text supposes a tabernacle state of the church, and to that we in this age have arrived. God's true Israel dwell in tents; we are pilgrims and strangers; and as our numbers increase, we must lengthen the cords, and strengthen the stakes of this tent, or the place will become too strait for us. The figure is a very natural one. In pitching a tent, the cord may be extended that spreads out the canvas, according to the strength of the center stake that supports the whole; and they would not be justified in refusing shelter to that poor exposed family because of the weakness of the stake; they ought to have one sufficiently strong to extend it to any necessary dimensions. Will this apply to us? The work is to be done; the cords are to be lengthened, and the stakes strengthened. We have done, and are now doing, something in lengthening the cords, though we have hardly begun to stretch them out; and our earnest inquiry should be to know what our duty is in that work. Numerous have been our excuses, when this subject has been presented, for not engaging in sending the gospel to the heathen. "It would cost a great deal of money to send men so far to those remote nations;" "it would be a great waste of time for men and women to spend years before they could preach to them in their own tongues the gospel of Jesus Christ." Now the time has come when we may not make this excuse. God is bringing the heathen from the ends of the earth to us, and placing them in our midst, and they are learning our language. And now the question comes to us, Will you preach the gospel to them? You need not cross the ocean to find them—I have brought them to you. The work that was necessary to be done in China, may now be done in America. The Germans, the Swedes, and the Norwegians, are here among us, and to them the gospel is to be preached. Are we ready and willing to do it? Who will go? They are accessible, and to them the gospel must and will be preached; they are an industrious, intelligent, moral, thinking people; they do and will think, and think and act for themselves, in opposition to the wishes of the priesthood. As a certain brother said, "You can as soon stop a Dutchman from smoking as to stop him from thinking." They are to be gathered into this gospel tent, and its cords will be lengthened as the stake is strengthened.

May it not be a subject of earnest and profitable inquiry among us as a people, Have we, and are we, attending properly to the work of strengthening the stakes? This must and will with great propriety apply to the various churches composing the denomination. Are we doing our duty, our whole duty, in strengthening, instructing, and building up those churches, that as a people we may be strong in faith, giving glory to God. I am fearful that the churches planted by our fathers have been neglected to their injury. Some of them have decreased in numbers, and of others "the candlesticks have been removed," and "the house of God lies waste." A number are destitute of pastors, there being no one to open to them the word of God. They are flocks without shepherds. If the churches are not vigorous and strong, but little will be done effectually abroad; we may commence, but we will not be able to finish. There is a wrong somewhere, either with the ministers or with the churches. No church will prosper without the preached word. And in looking over the list of ministers and churches, we find ministers, good men, tried men, strong men, and wise men, unemployed—no flock to watch over and instruct. Why is this? There is a wrong in ministers seeking a desirable place to live, and there locate, without any regard to usefulness, or to the wants of the church. We who are ministers must be willing to practice more self-denial, and lay ourselves out for the glory of God. Our brethren often complain of us, and it may be justly, when we are folding our hands in ease, and souls are perishing all around us. If God has put us in the ministry, there is a place for us to occupy, and work for us to do. Brethren in the ministry, are we willing to enter the wild forest, if needful, and do up this work in time? Old age and infirmities will soon lay us aside from active service. Then what we do we must do quickly.

I do not hesitate to say, that there is a wrong in the churches. They are wanting, greatly wanting, in interest in the cause of God; and many, very many, we fear, had rather see the church suffer than to make the necessary sacrifice for her support. They are not wanting in interest in other matters. Their political position must be supported; they can willingly do their proportion in the support of government, and no complaining; no objections to paying the school teacher his three or his six hundred dollars per year, and it is paid punctually. But to pay the minister of God that sum, is thought to be extravagant. He is (say they) an extortioner, notwithstanding his additional expenses. Can those churches reasonably expect the ministers to make all the sacrifices? No; there is not a man whom God has put into the work, who is not willing to do his part; but the churches must come up to this work, and support the ministry as liberally as they do the other professions; and then, and not till then, should they expect to have pastors after God's own heart. God will send ministers to the churches when the churches are ready to take proper care of them. The Lord Jesus Christ commanded his church to "pray to the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth laborers into his harvest." The mere expression of the lip is not the fulfillment of this command. The most of those who are called into the gospel field are from among the poor. It was so in the Apostle's days—"not many rich." The present times demand a thorough mental preparation for the ministerial work, and in addition every minister should have from two to five hundred dollars worth of books; and every intelligent young man knows this—and often, in his meditations and struggles with his conscience, he comes to the conclusion that he will not disgrace the ministry; and as no means are presented, or encouragements held out to them by which they can honor the ministry, they set down in hopeless despair. What a small matter would it be for each of our Associations to educate one or two or three young men? It would gladden your hearts, and be for God's glory, thus to do. Individual churches should do this. If you have young men of promise among you, call them out, encourage them, educate them, and send them into the gospel field, or assist in placing them over some destitute church in the Lord.

Churches that are destitute are probably to blame. I have known churches destitute for years, and never in all that time even extend to any one a call to settle with them—and still complaining that they have no minister. Would you do thus with your temporal affairs? If you had need of an additional laborer on your farm, you would go in pursuit of one; and if you failed at first, you would try again and again.

Let the stakes be strengthened, and we would find gifts and graces, with which the Zion of God might be blessed, and then with safety we might lengthen the cords, until the nations now in darkness may become a part of God's beloved Zion.

KNOCKED BACK.

A pious old negro was set to plowing a very rough piece of new ground. Every few feet the plow would run against a rock or stump. The horse, moreover, was very dull, so that, when thus stopped, it was very hard to start him again. The poor negro, of course, had a hard time of it, and his piety and patience were severely tested. At last they began to give way. The altercations between him and his horse became more violent at every fresh occasion for getting him in motion again. Finally, in a moment of frenzy, he swore away at the horse in a terrific manner. A moment's reflection, however, filled him with distress, and, addressing his horse, he said in a plaintive tone:

"Dar, now, you miserable brute, see what you've done! You've jes gone and knocked me right back into the world again!"

"Formerly death appeared to me like a wide river, but now it has dwindled to a little rill; and my comforts, which were as the rill, have become the broad and deep stream."

GOOD NIGHT.

"Good night!" a word so often said,
The heedless mind forgets its meaning;
'T is only when some heart lies dead,
On which our own was leaning,
We hear in maddening music roll
That last "good night" along the soul.

"Good night!" in tones that never die,
It peals along the quickened ear;
And tender gales of memory
Forever waft it near,
When stilled the voice—oh, crush of pain!—
That ne'er shall breathe "good night" again.

"Good night!" it mocks us from the grave;
It overleaps that strange world's bound
From whence there flows no backward wave;
It calls from out the ground,
On every side, around, above,
"Good night, good night," to life and love!

"Good night!" Oh! wherefore fades away
The light that lived in that dear word?
Why follows that "good night" no day?
Why are our souls so stirred?
Oh! rather say, dull brain, once more,
"Good night!" thy time of toil is o'er.

"Good night!" Now cometh gentle sleep,
And tears that fall like welcome rain.
"Good night!"—oh, holy, blest and deep.
The rest that follows pain.
How should we reach God's upper light
If life's long day hath no "good night?"

RELIGIOUS EXERCISES IN COMMON SCHOOLS.

Decision of the State Superintendent on the Right to compel Catholic Children to attend Prayers and to read or commit portions of the Bible, as School Exercises.

STATE OF NEW YORK, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Department of Common Schools,
ALBANY, Oct. 27, 1853.

In the matter of the complaint of the Rev. Dr. Quigley, o Schaghticoke, agt. Margaret Gifford and others.

The complaint sets forth, that in most of the Common Schools in portions of Rensselaer and Washington Counties the religion and faith of Catholic children are interfered with by their being compelled to "join in prayers," and "to read and commit" portions of a version of the Bible of which the Catholic Church disapproves. It sets forth specifically, that on the 8th day of August last Margaret Gifford, a Common School Teacher in South Easton, Washington County, ordered William Callagan, a pupil aged twelve years, "to study and read the Protestant Testament;" that on his declining so to do, on the plea "that he was a Catholic, and did not believe in any but the Catholic Bible," said teacher consulted the Trustees on the subject; that on the 9th of August, she again required the boy to "read out of the unauthorized edition," (meaning the English version of the Bible translated under the orders of James I. of England, and generally used by Protestants;) that on his declaring "his unwillingness to disobey the order of his parents and violate the precepts of his religion," the teacher "chastised him severely with her ferule and then expelled him ignominiously from the school."

This complaint brings before the Superintendent three questions:

1. May the pupils of a common school be required to "join in prayers," as a matter of school discipline?

2. May Catholic children be required, contrary to their own wishes and those of their parents, to use the Protestant version of the Bible as a reading book in the schools?

3. May Catholic children be required to commit to memory portions of the same version of the Bible, as a part of their school exercises.

1. It was held by Dix, superintendent, in answer to an inhabitant of Mount Morris, whose name is not given, (manuscript books of "Orders and Decisions of Superintendent," in this office, vol. 6, p. 148,) that "the teacher of a school may open it with prayer, provided he does not encroach on the hours allotted for instruction, and provided the attendance of the scholars is not exacted as a matter of school discipline." The same is affirmed by Dix, in a letter to an inhabitant of Floyd. (Orders and Decisions, vol. 6, p. 394.) Spencer, superintendent, concurs in the above opinion, and so authoritatively held in the appeal of Briant White and others, inhabitants of No. 15, in the town of Barry, agt. the Trustees. In this case he affirmatively holds that no pupils can be compelled to attend such prayers, taking place as they only properly can before or after school hours. (Orders and Decisions, vol. 8, p. 86.) Spencer holds the same in the appeal of Abner Burlingame and others agt. The Trustees of School District No. 13, in the town of Columbus. (Orders and Decisions, vol. 8, p. 102.) The decision in this case involves no new principle, but it so clearly points out the rights and duties of all the parties, and the practical manner of carrying them out, that I quote it. He says:—

"Prayers cannot form any part of the school exercises or be regulated by the school discipline. If had at all, they should be had before the hour of 9 o'clock, the usual hour of commencing school in the morning, and after 5 o'clock in the afternoon. If any parents are desirous of habituating their children to the practice of thanking their Creator for his protection during the night, and invoking his blessing on the labors of the day, they have a right to place them under the charge of the teacher for that purpose. But neither they nor the teacher have any authority to compel the children of other parents who object to the practice from dislike of the individual or his creed, or from any other cause, to unite in such prayers. And, on the other hand, the latter have no right to obstruct the former in the discharge of what they deem a sacred duty. Both parties have rights; and it is only by a mutual and reciprocal regard by each to the rights of the other that peace can be maintained, or a school can flourish. The teacher may assemble in his school-room before 9 o'clock the children of those parents who desire him to conduct religious exercises for them; and the children of those who object to the practice will be allowed to retire or absent themselves from the room. If they persist in remaining there, they must conduct with the decorum and propriety becoming the occasion. If they do not so conduct, they may be dealt with as intruders."

No later or counter decisions are to be found on the records of this office, and the above, therefore, must be regarded as the hitherto well settled rule in the premises, so far as the action of this Department is concerned. Believing it founded on principles of equity, and in that spirit of entire religious toleration which characterizes our constitution and laws, and which should characterize every institution, literary or other, founded by the State, I have no disposition to disturb it. And I should have no hesitation in applying and enforcing it in the cases presented by the complainant, or in any other, if brought before me by appeal so as to demand my official action.

2. Beyond a mere dictum or opinion given by Superintendent Dix, in 1838, (Orders and Decisions, vol. 6, p. 261,) on the abstract propriety of making the Bible a reading book in the Common Schools, in which he expressed himself convinced of said propriety, I find nothing bearing directly on the point in the orders and decisions of my predecessors. Opinions from some of them have been publicly referred to, but if given, they were not made matters of record in this office. Meanwhile, the question has at various periods seriously agitated portions of the community, and even the aid of legislation has been invoked to settle it. The recent great increase and diffusion throughout the State of a Roman Catholic population, who, while they profess to make the Bible the guide of life, wholly repudiate the common English version of it as unauthorized, and who, on conscientious grounds, refuse to read it, or permit their children to read it, has thrown additional embarrassments in the way of any adjustment of the dispute which will be satisfactory to all. Notwithstanding these difficulties, I feel, on this first presentation of the matter before me, that I am bound to frankly and explicitly state my views, and the grounds on which I should base my official action, should appeals involving the question be brought before me.

In theory, I never have been able to doubt that intellectual and religious instruction should go hand in hand. To divorce them entirely, and to only bestow attention on the former, is to draw forth and add to the powers of the mind without giving it any moral helm to guide it; in other words, it is to increase the capacity without diminishing the propensity to do evil. To banish religious education from the schools, is, in a multitude of instance, to consign it to the care of the vicious, the careless, or those who feel that they have no time to attend to it. The placing of it in its natural connection with intellectual education in the School room, has met, however, in our country, with serious practical obstacles. The Government not relying on the ability or willingness of every part of the State to maintain efficient schools for the education of the young, by voluntary contributions, and recognizing the imperative necessity of universal education for the maintenance of our civil and political institutions, organized a general common school system, and made provisions to aid those sending to school, in sustaining it, by the payment of a large sum annually from the treasury. To prevent this money from being misapplied, it prescribed the condition on which it shall be received and expended—the mode of appointing, and the duties of all school officers—and it created a special State officer, with administrative and judicial powers, to carry out and enforce the system. The common schools were thus clearly made a Government institution. To introduce into them, or permit to be introduced into them, a course of religious instruction conformable to the views of any religious denomination, would be tantamount to the adoption of a Government religion—a step contrary to the Constitution, and equally at variance with the policy of a free government and the wishes of the people. To form for the schools a course of instruction which could bear the name of a religious one, and which would meet the views of all, was manifestly impossible. To give to every sect a prorata share of the school moneys, to enable it to support its own schools and teach its own system of religious faith in them, would be, in the sparsely inhabited country districts, to divide the children within the territory convenient for attendance on a single school, and in which the support of all the inhabitants is frequently scarcely adequate, with the aid of the public moneys, to sustain a single efficient school, into a dozen or more schools. Indeed, under this arrangement, a single indigent family would often be required to support its own school, to go without any, or to violate its conscience by joining with others in one in which a religious system was taught, wholly at variance with its own. There are other reasons which have gone to convince the public mind of the impracticability of carrying out such a plan so as to attain the object sought—the education of all the people—which do not require enumeration.

In view of the above facts, the position was early, distinctly, and almost universally taken, by our statesmen, legislators, and prominent friends of education—men of the warmest religious zeal, and belonging to every sect—that religious education must be banished from the Common Schools and consigned to the family and the church. If felt that this was an evil, it was felt that it was the least one of which the circumstances admitted. Accordingly, the instruction in our schools has been limited to that ordinarily included under the head of intellectual culture, and to the propagation of those principles of morality in which all sects and good men belonging to no sect can equally agree. The tender consciences of all have been respected. We have seen that even prayer—that morning and evening duty which man owes to his Creator—which even the pagan and savage do not withhold from the gods of their blinded devotion—which, conducted in any proper spirit, is no more sectarian than that homage which constantly goes up from all nature, animate and inanimate, to the bountiful Giver of all things—has been decided by two of our most eminent Superintendents as inadmissable as a school exercise within school hours; and that no pupil's conscience or inclination shall be violated by being compelled to listen to it. This decision has been acquiesced in without a murmur, by the whole religious public. The intelligent religious public have felt that there was no tenable middle ground between thorough religious instruction in our Common Schools, and the broadest toleration. Driven by circumstances to adopt the latter position, they have embraced it in its most comprehensive import, and have nerved themselves to the task of supplying a lamentable omission in the Public Schools, by increased assiduity to the spiritual wants of their offspring in the family circle, in the Sunday school, and in the Church. In our crowded City, where poverty sinks to its lowest ebb, and vice puts on its most unmitigated forms, where multitudes of children would receive no religious instruction from or through the instrumentality of their parents, voluntary church and individual organizations are putting forth their endeavors to supply such instruction. Many, doubtless, are not reached by these efforts; nor would they be reached if religion was taught in the Common Schools, for the children of the extremely poor and the vicious oftentimes could not or would not attend them.

Not only has the principle of entire religious toleration in our schools been acquiesced in between the leading Protestant sects who regard each other as orthodox in the cardinal doctrines of Christianity, but between such and those pronounced by them to be utterly heretical. Not only have the Episcopalian, the Presbyterian, the Baptist and the Methodist met on common and neutral ground, in the school room, but with them, the Unitarian and Universalist, the Quaker, and even the denier of all creeds. No offensive school exercise or discipline has been made compulsory on any of these—no obnoxious test forced upon them. Shall a solitary and invidious exception then be made against a church professing to be governed by the principles of Christianity, and which includes within its hold a large number of citizens whom our laws place on the same footing with all?

I believe that the Holy Scriptures, and especially the portion of them known as the New Testament, are proper to be read in schools by pupils who have attained sufficient literary and mental culture to understand their import. I believe they may, as a matter of right, be read as a class-book by those whose parents desire it. But I am clearly of the opinion that the reading of no version of them can be forced on those whose conscience and religion object to such version.

Assuming the facts stated in the complaint to be true, I consider the conduct of the teacher, Margaret Gifford, to be not only unwarrantable, but barbarous. That she should not only "ignominiously expel" the pupil, but that she should gratuitously inflict a preliminary castigation on a child of tender years, who plead the commands of his "parents and the precepts of his religion" against the obeyal of her orders, betrays feelings as unusual to her sex as repugnant to the mild teachings of that Gospel which, I trust, with honest, though certainly with mistaken zeal, she was attempting to uphold. Perhaps she deserves a lesser measure of reprehension if she acted, as it would appear, though it is not expressly stated, under the direction of the Trustees. But neither the Trustees, the majority of the people of the districts, the Town Superintendent, nor all of these united, would have power to authorize such an outrage.

This Department was established to protect the rights of all in the equal and peaceable enjoyment of the schools instituted by the government, and sustained by funds to which those of every faith and creed are bound to contribute in proportion to their property. It is the province of the Superintendent to see this done, regardless of prejudice or numbers. I will not shrink from the duty. If the facts set forth in the complaint are incontrovertibly made to appear, in due form of law, I will, acting in my original or appellate jurisdiction, according to the source from which Margaret Gifford obtained her certificate of qualification to teach, annul such certificate, and thus prevent her from teaching a school which can share in the public moneys. * * *

3. The right of a teacher to compel Catholic children to commit to memory portions of the Protestant version of the Bible, need not be discussed, the solution of the question being fully involved in that of the preceding one. If such children may not be compelled to read such version, the reasons are every way stronger why they should not be compelled to learn and repeat it in the nature of a religious or literary lesson.

KEEP TRYING.

In one of the large towns in Eastern Virginia there lived a gentleman with an interesting family, much respected by his friends, but he was inclined to be sceptical on the subject of the Christian religion. He was a man of mind, and of more than ordinary intelligence. A lingering disease at last brought him down to his bed, and his Christian friends became exceedingly solicitous in reference to his salvation. Various attempts were made to approach him on that subject, but he met every advance with a cold repulse, that disheartened his friends, and paralyzed their efforts.

Among others that felt deeply for him, and prayed earnestly for his conversion, was an interesting Christian lady who lived next door to his residence. She was often in his room, and made frequent efforts to draw him out in conversation upon the subject of religion; but was unsuccessful. He seemed unhappy; but he preserved outward cheerfulness, and kept up the impression that his scepticism was unshaken by the hand of disease and the near approach of death.

He was fond of reading, and constantly kept by him some book that served to beguile his weary hours. When he grew so feeble that he could not read, he called into requisition the services of one of his little daughters, who sat by his bedside and read for him by the hour. His kind friend, the good lady at the next door, was still anxious to approach him on the subject of religion, but without success. One day she entered his room and found him asleep. A new idea struck her. She returned and got a tract containing a solemn appeal to a sinner in prospect of death, which she carried into his room, laid it on his pillow, and retired as softly as an angel, without waking the sleeping man. She went to her home and prayed that some good might come of it.

By and by he awoke, and, apparently by chance, laid his hand on the little book. Without attempting to examine it himself, he called for his little daughter, who was in the adjoining room, to come and read for him. She flew to his bedside and commenced reading it to her afflicted father. She had not proceeded far before his eyes filled with tears, his chin trembled, and his bosom began to heave with emotion. The voice of the girl trembled as she saw the effect upon her father, but she continued reading. He asked her to pause for a moment, and tried to regain his self-possession; and after a few moments told her to read on. She did so. But presently his feelings became too strong for concealment. Tears gushed from his eyes, and he gave way to a violent weeping. The child read on as she was able; for she too was sobbing as though her little heart would break.

The conviction came home with tremendous power to the man's heart, that he was a sinner, condemned by God's holy law, and exposed to hell. He began to pray. The Holy Spirit applied divine truth to his heart and conscience; and directly he sent for his friend at the next door, and other pious persons, to pray for him and instruct him in the way of salvation. He confessed his sins and tried to give his heart to God. The minister was sent for, and he was taught more fully the way of life. Before the man died, his friends had the happiness to believe that he was savingly converted by faith in the Son of God.

SEED SOWN BY THE WAYSIDE.

In the wilds of Kentucky, at the foot of a mountain, stood a small cottage, concealed from view by overhanging trees. The birch, the maple, the stately oak and graceful elm were grouped together; and as the eye glanced upward, tints of every hue blended in wild profusion. The branches, which in summer swayed to and fro in the south wind, and emitted sounds not unlike the strains of distant music, now dashed in impotent fury against the humble casement window. The stream, which an hour since smiled in peaceful beauty, now rolled its dark waters on rapidly, while the distant prairie looked like the agitated billows of the ocean. Large drops of rain began to fall, and as the congregated masses of dark clouds seemed to grow heavier over this humble dwelling, the latch was quietly moved, the door opened, and a female face appeared, looking to the right and left, with much anxiety.

"Is he come, mother?" said a feeble voice from within.

"Not yet, my child; it is too early."

The little sufferer sighed, as if acquiescing in the necessity. Then, after a few moments, "Mother, mother!" he cried, starting up from his low pallet and looking around affrighted at the storm.

"What is it, my dear boy?" said she, taking his burning hand.

"O mother! don't you wish Jesus was here, that blessed little children? You know the good man with the books told us of him. I am very sick; perhaps he could make me better."

"Shall I read you something about this blessed Jesus?"

"No; tell me, mother! tell it me!"

The mother bent over him. Recollections of early reading came fast to her mind as she said: "The widow of Nain had an only son, and he died; and—"

"Will I die, mother?"

"I hope not!" she fervently ejaculated.

"Oh! can't you tell me a prayer, mother? The good gentleman said I must pray every day."

The weeping mother kneeled down, folded his little hands in hers, and said, "Pray God forgive my sins, take away my wicked heart, and make me to love Jesus." The child repeated it after her, and then said, "I will say it softly, mother; it hurts me to speak."

His infant lips moved in prayer, till he slept! The mother watched the lowly couch, a petition often coming from her heart, that the boy might live; that grace might be given her to bear this great sorrow. She took down her new Bible—the gift of the colporteur—and opened its pages. But no mark was there placed opposite a precious promise verified; no remembrance of the past rose to mind, that there the Comforter was given, that there a bond of sin was broken, that there the purity and truth of God was manifested, and his love to a guilty world redeemed. She and that precious book were strangers!

The father entered, accompanied by a boy about twelve years of age. The labor of the week was over. The mother pointed in silent agony to the changed face of the child! The father's hard features, embrowned by toil and exposure, worked with suppressed emotions; while the lad, awed by the mysterious influences around, seated himself on a low bench in the corner.

The Sabbath morning rose, fair and beautiful without; but the Angel of Death had entered that lowly dwelling, and all within was changed. The mother read her Bible, and occasionally uncovered the pale face of her child! Thoughts of the past crowded upon her mind. The days of childhood, of Christian instruction, of holy communion, of consecrated Sabbaths, rose before her. She thought of the influence of worldly cares in their new home, unchecked by the preaching of the gospel or the reading of God's Word. She mourned in bitterness of spirit the hardness of her heart, her forgetfulness of every religious duty. The deep fountain of her feelings was broken up, and tears of godly sorrow fell on the unconscious form of her boy. The bereaved father sought communion and sympathy with her in this his first sorrow. The same consolations became his; and when, three months after, the colporteur returned, he found that the Spirit of God was there; that sanctified affliction had hallowed that cottage home, and that the light of peace and love were within it. The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, November 17, 1853.

Proclamation,

By Horatio Seymour, Governor of the State of N. Y.

I hereby appoint THURSDAY, the twenty-fourth inst., as a day of THANKSGIVING for the people of the State of New York. I recommend its suitable observance by such religious assemblages and forms of worship as [illegible] may, severally deem appropriate; so that we, as a commonwealth, with united hearts, humbly and gratefully render thanks to our Father in Heaven for His benefits, and earnestly implore the continuance of His favor.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the privy seal of the State, [L. S.] at the city of Albany, this 5th day of November, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three.

By the Governor, HORATIO SEYMOUR.
H. W. DePuy, Private Secretary.

FAMILY GOVERNMENT AS AFFECTED BY MIXED MARRIAGES.

In these days of "Woman's Rights," it is somewhat hazardous to say any thing of the authority of the sterner sex; but, for the confirmation of what we set forth last week, and in order to impress the minds of our females still more deeply with the inexpediency of matrimonial alliances with the observers of Sunday, we say plainly, that "the head of the woman is the man," and that, if she fills her place as a wife should, she will honor the government which her husband exercises over her. It is true, he has no right to establish a government at variance with the law of God. Every principle of moral rectitude binds him to exercise his authority in strict accordance with the Scriptures; and should he command his wife to do an act manifestly sinful, she might lawfully refuse to obey. But it should be remembered, that for the abuse of his authority the husband is responsible, not to his wife, but to God, on the principle that every subordinate officer is responsible to the governor that entrusts him with authority, and not to those who are placed under him. And though the wife may refuse to obey in all those cases where obedience would conflict with her direct personal responsibility as a subject of God's moral government, she must not suppose herself entitled to do so in other cases.

In regard to the case under consideration, the most that a wife can claim is the privilege of laying aside her ordinary work on the Sabbath, and consecrating the time to religious purposes. If, in addition, she claims the privilege of working on Sunday, she claims what the husband may, if he see fit, refuse to allow. It is possible, that he may regard the first day of the week as the divinely-appointed Sabbath under the Gospel. This, at any rate, is Protestant doctrine, and there are thousands of firm believers in it. He may suppose, that the Fourth Commandment binds him to remember the first day of the week to keep it holy. If so, he is bound to see that every member of his family ceases to labor on that day; for the commandment lays its injunction upon him with regard to them all—son and daughter, man-servant and maid-servant, cattle and the stranger dwelling within his gates. And though the wife is not particularly named in these specifications, it is because the law of God takes it for granted that the husband and wife are both one, and equally interested in seeing that the commandment is complied with. Hence, where the husband supposes that the first day of the week is the Sabbath, and enjoins upon his household to observe it as such, the wife's duty is to obey. It may be burdensome for her to keep two days every week, but it is a burden which she must bear. She must keep one day for conscience towards God—a matter in which she is personally responsible—another out of respect to her husband's authority.

We have no sympathy with those who would encourage the wife to disobey in this matter. That the husband is in error as to his views, is nothing to the point. Her obedience is not an indorsement of his doctrine; it is simply an act of respect to the authority which God has given him over her. And reason teaches, that in every community, large or small, the supreme authority must be vested somewhere. There cannot be two kings to one kingdom, nor two suns to the solar system, nor two heads to any community. The family is a little community; and though there ought not to be difference of views in regard to what shall be the order and regulations of the family; though husband and wife ought to agree in this matter; yet, if difference should arise, there must of necessity be some ultimate authority, from which there shall be no appeal. And both Scripture and the common sense of mankind, have vested this authority in the husband and father. On any other principle family government could not exist.

We admit that in regard to family government, especially in regard to moulding the characters of the children, a heavy responsibility rests upon the wife. If she is a sensible woman, and a Christian, she will feel this responsibility; it will weigh upon her most oppressively. It is in connection with this keen sense of responsibility, that conscience is liable to take on morbid action. In the notion that she is, directly and personally, responsible for the forms of religion in which she educates her children, the wife sometimes feels conscience-bound to fly directly in the face of her husband's authority, and to prescribe forms which she knows that he disapproves. On this point we feel how difficult it is to express ourselves in such a way as will not be liable to misconstruction. Perhaps a case referred to in the New Testament will help us a little.

It is related (Acts 16) that, when Paul came to Derbe and Lystra, he found a disciple named Timothy. The mother of this Timothy was a Jewess, but his father, it seems, was a Greek. Notwithstanding Timothy was a full grown man, (or, at all events, old enough to be a believer in Christ,) he had never been circumcised. Now, as his mother was a Jewess, and of course held under a responsibility in common with all other Jewish mothers to train her children in the way of God's commandments, why was this omission? Why did she not, in the exercise of her maternal responsibility, present him to the Lord according to the ritual of the Hebrew law? Had not God said, "Every man child among you shall be circumcised?" Was not the law on this point as imperative as that on Sabbath-keeping, or any other? How could she reconcile it to her conscience to disregard so plain, so positive a command? Still, Timothy had not been circumcised; and the only reason assigned for this omission is that his father was not a Jew—that he was a Greek. And this explanation of the matter is presented in such a way as to show that it was not a singular case, for which the mother was reprehensible, but that it belonged to a class of cases where one uniform rule applied. For as Paul circumcised him "because of the Jews that were in those quarters," the fair presumption is, that he would not have circumcised him, had not his uncircumcision been a fact too notorious to be hid from the Jews. Yet the only way in which the Jews are represented as knowing anything about it was by his parentage; "for they all knew that his father was a Greek."

Now the practical inference furnished by this account is this: That the father is the lawful head and governor of his own family; that his authority in this respect is so sacred, that it must not be interfered with by the mother, even for the sake of a divinely prescribed form with regard to the dedication of her children; and that this was a universally admitted principle with the Jews of old. Yet, clear as this principle is, so morbidly sensitive are the consciences of some, that they can never rest till they have performed an act of direct rebellion against the father's authority, under the mistaken notion that otherwise they could not answer their duty to God? We have heard of Pedobaptist mothers offering their children in baptism, in defiance of the express prohibition of the fathers, and of Pedobaptist ministers that encouraged them to do so.

Clearly, the authority is with the husband and father. And if Seventh-day Baptist women will become the wives of Sunday-keepers, we shall not pity them a great deal if they find themselves burdened with the keeping of two days in the week instead of one. Nor shall we wonder if, as family cares increase, they find the burden too heavy to bear; for this will very probably be the case; and at last, worn out and discouraged, they will forsake the Lord's Sabbath to keep that of their husbands. We say again, that our protest is against the intermarriages of our females with the men of other orders.

TRUST IN GOD.

God is the Creator and Preserver of all things. Man is among the created and preserved. God is independent—man is dependent. God is self-existent—man is conditionally, contingently existent. God is omnipotent—man is finite in power. God is omniscient—man is finite in wisdom—a wisdom that is foolishness withal. God is omnipresent—man's sphere is but limited. God is infinitely holy and happy—man is unholy and unhappy. All of the attributes of God are underived and unconditioned—those of man derived and conditioned. These relations are fully and lucidly taught by revelation. Our reason and experience also bear testimony to the truthfulness of its teachings.

These relations imply, as a natural and legitimate consequence, watchfulness and protection on the part of God—confidence and trust on the part of man. Confidence implies geniality of spirit—a harmony of aims and pursuits—a reciprocal love. We trust not our fellow man implicitly, unless there is this harmony, this geniality, this love; much less can we repose full confidence in God without this intimate spiritual relationship. This lies at the foundation of all trust. We must also possess that filial regard and esteem which will enable us to look up to God as our Father—feeling that he is infinite in love and wisdom, and will lead us, and preserve and bless us, as his children. This will give a ready submission to His laws—a willingness to be guided by His providences—a cheerful resignation to His will. Happy is the man who is earnestly and cheerfully working out his mission in that sphere—amid those relations of life where he has been placed by an over-ruling Providence. He that reposes implicit confidence in God, will manifest a willingness, a readiness, to fall in with and adopt the plan of salvation which Infinite Wisdom has seen fit to provide for man—a willingness to submit, not only his temporal, but also his eternal interests, to God. Growing out of this, there will be a readiness, a desire, to labor in carrying forward the great plan of salvation, and in bringing others to partake of its benefits.

Blessed are the results of such a trust to the individual himself. It gives power over evil and change and temptation. It gives permanency, stability—gives a life above worldly things—a higher and purer life than is derived from earthly motives or trust. To walk humbly and carefully before God—to be patient amid trial and suffering—to be zealous and persevering in every good work—to be constant in prayer and praise—to have a confident looking forward to eternity for the rewards of life and as the home of the righteous—are characteristic of him who trusts implicitly in God as his Creator, Preserver, and Redeemer.

Though various ills betide our way,
While walking life's uncertain road,
In Thee we trust—to Thee we pray,
Our Saviour and eternal Lord.

AUTUMN.

When the first breeze of Spring dances over my face, and whispers in my ear of budding flowers, unfettered streams, and genial sunshine, my heart leaps up with wild delight, and bounds away to meet the coming, soul-refreshing blessings.

When Summer, with her many-toned voice of music, greets me, and invites me forth rejoicing in her matured beauty, the heart-welcome of my response is but the echo of her own gladness.

But when the low deep breath of Autumn steals over me, like the last faint sigh of a departing spirit, and I recognize in the deepened tint on Nature's cheek the token of coming decay, and note each changing expression as I would watch the countenance of a dying friend, my soul is thrilled with a sacred sadness, yet mingled with a deep and holy joy. Autumn! dreamy, hazy—Autumn! with thy delicate sky-tints, thy rich golden sunlight, and thy time-softened beauties! My spirit does thee homage.

Who has traced the farewell beams of Summer's beauty, lingering around the brow of Autumn, like a faint halo of glory, and watched each receding gleam as it fades from view, and not felt his soul gradually free itself from its earth-bindings, and soar away upward, and upward, as if on a Heaven-inspired mission, until it has caught a far-off glimpse of those yet unrevealed glories of the upper world, and there reveled in dream-like bliss, such bliss perhaps as the fully-freed spirit knows in its heavenward flight?

There's a freshness in Spring, that is exhilarating; there's a beauty in Summer, that is ennobling; but there's a glory in Autumn, that is soul-subduing.

OUR PALESTINE MISSION.

"The Committee on Outfit" would suggest, that among the articles contributed for the needy in Palestine, to be dispensed by our brethren as circumstances may require, we should have a good supply of the following articles:—

Dry Goods and Clothing.—Chiefly comprising coarse woolen and cotton fabrics, suitable for the destitute Jewish laborer who may be employed in the garden, or for others in like circumstances; a quantity of trimmings, sewing cotton, and linen thread; a quantity of coarse strong articles of clothing, of all sizes and descriptions, including shoes.

Farming Utensils, Tools, &c.—A general assortment of farming and garden implements and seeds; two side-saddles, a number of bridles, one or two sets of double ploughing harness, a quantity of grain bags and bagging, a few casks, kegs, and buckets (pails,) a quantity of tin ware, common oil-cloth for floors, some blacksmith tools, also carpenter tools, nails of all sizes, pieces of steel, iron, hinges, screws, door and window fastenings, a small quantity of paints, oil and varnish, and brushes. These things cannot be procured there, without difficulty; others may be suggested by the experienced housekeepers and gardeners.

The offerings of our brethren to the land of Judea should be stimulated by the example of the Gentile Christians whose contributions were carried to the poor of Jerusalem by the Apostle Paul. Our contribution to the poor will not be lost. Let us give in the name of Christ, who has left gracious promises to those who give to the needy. "Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor," "so shalt thou have treasure in heaven." Remember, the Jews are beloved for the fathers' sakes, and they are not now the less beloved because our fathers have persecuted and destroyed them in all the earth. Let our missionary brethren now have the means of softening the rigor of the cruelty the afflicted sons of Israel have heretofore experienced at the hands of professed Christians.

An astonishing number were saved in the days of Christ and the Apostles, and may be still; for though their national organization and government have received their just award from the hand of God, yet He is no respecter of persons, that he should delight in their temporal sufferings, any more than in the wretchedness of Gentiles in this or other lands.

We do not design to give the poor their food and clothing, and leave them in their wretchedness when our gifts are exhausted in their hands, but to make the little tokens of our regard useful in a higher degree, by placing them in circumstances to earn their own bread by the labor of their own hands, and thus be enabled to shake off the shackles of a dependence far more intolerable than the burthen of the poor in our own land.

We hope our contributions will be but as a drop in the bucket to the good that will be effected by the faithful, judicious benevolent and Christian instruction in the arts of life which our missionaries will be able to impart.

We trust the narrow-minded policy heretofore pursued by many, will not be continued by our mission to the Jews; we will not buy converts, or seek by unlawful or unfair means to gain proselytes to our cause, but by a kind word and a good deed let them see the works of Christ toward them; for we desire only to set Christ on high, to the glory of God the Father, and this we will do, assisted by His grace.

The views and feelings of the denomination in regard to Palestine have been very clearly indicated by the receipts for that object published in the Recorder. Accompanying the donations of our brethren, our agent speaks of deep feeling, fervent prayers, and solemn pledges, in behalf of our mission, which encourage us to hope that our people have a heart, and that they will, the Lord helping them, work in this enterprise. As an evidence of the interest or tone of feeling in various sections, we give the following extracts from letters received by Bro. Jones.

From a brother in the Central Association, enclosing a resolution of his church respecting the Palestine Mission:—

"I hope some measure will be adopted to give employment and bread to those who may wish it, as I believe our usefulness would be greatly enhanced thereby, and the philanthropy and the true mission of the Gospel be more readily appreciated, and more practically explained."

The Resolution of the Church:—

Resolved, That the full mission of Christianity should be exhibited by an Industrial Institution being connected with our efforts, that the inquirers after truth may be protected from physical sufferings by that means."

The brother adds:—

"As far as I am informed, this sentiment prevails in this section of the denomination."

From a brother in Shiloh:—

"We read with much interest and pleasure your letter in last week's Recorder, describing your visit West, and the hospitality and liberality of the people in that region. We can hardly realize, though I suppose it is a fact, that you and Mrs. J. and M. are soon to leave this country for the land of Palestine. We feel very much as we did when Bro. Carpenter was about to leave for China—a kind of reluctance to part with you. But I know we should rejoice that there are those amongst us who are willing to forego the pleasures of home and kindred, and the society of friends, for the purpose of advancing the cause of the Redeemer. May the blessing of the Lord be upon you, and upon this enterprise."

The following was accompanied by a donation in favor of this mission:—

"May the rich blessing of Heaven accompany you and Bro. Saunders to that land of inexpressibly deeper interest than any other land, save the 'land of pure delight.'

"Truly yours, Gerrit Smith."

The day of sailing is not yet fixed; but the passage of our brethren will be engaged by the Committee by the first vessel; therefore all things should be ready. The Committee.

SABBATH LECTURES.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

A recent article, headed "Tract Distribution," which appeared in the columns of the Recorder, seems rather to oppose Sabbath Lectures, and to adopt in their stead colporterage and tract distribution. Without detracting from the last two, as efficient agencies in the work of Sabbath reform, may not the other be undervalued? And may not the same objections which the writer of "Tract Distribution" urges against lectures, be made against public preaching? He says:—

"Sometimes, it is true, a public argument is valuable; but in the majority of instances, people prefer, upon a question that involves a complete revolution of their practice, to think the matter over quietly, without being subjected to the chafings of dispute, or to such importunities as one who earnestly maintains his argument is likely to employ. They want to take time for consideration; the subject is new to them."

Now, in this objection, what is there which may not with equal propriety be said against the public preaching of the gospel, or of almost any other subject, as Temperance, Slavery, War, or any reform? When Christ preached certain truths, many complained that he reproached them—that his doctrine was hard—that he stirred up the people. Peter's pentecostal lectures roused the fury of the priesthood; Stephen's argument chafed his hearers exceedingly; and Felix asked for time to consider. And yet there is no intimation that either Christ, Peter, Stephen, or Paul, who argued the point well, and delivered lectures to the people as they were, thought of any more quiet or unobtrusive way, because the subject was new. They pressed home to the heart and conscience the truth, although they knew full well that the doctrine they taught involved a complete revolution of practice in those who heard.

And who does not know, that the preaching of the gospel, even now, involves a complete revolution of practice in the world in many things? Not the gospel which is preached, and caters to public opinion, but such a gospel as would deliver the captive, restore to its rightful owner the fertile plains of Montezuma, beat swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks. Let the true gospel of the Son of God be preached now, and many will prefer a more quiet and unobtrusive way. The fact seems to me, that any kind of movement which agitates community is to be shunned. For one, I am not prepared to admit that the millennium is already quite so near as that ministers can with safety lay aside their armor, or retire from the arena of conflict, or that the devil is so far chained and imprisoned as to warrant the conclusion that mere amiability will succeed in shutting the bottomless pit upon him.

Now, while prudence and discretion may be the better part of valor, and it might be "often better to have one who knows how to hold his tongue," yet to cry aloud and spare not—to lift up one's voice like a trumpet, for the purpose of showing the people of God their transgressions—may still be demanded.

If the Sabbath be of that importance which one would suppose, from the prominency given to it, both in the Bible and in the editorials of the Recorder, is it not of sufficient importance to employ in its defense the best talent of the denomination—men who can argue the point well, and are competent to deliver lectures as they go? How often is an educated ministry, a competent ministry, urged upon the consideration of our people, as necessary to the preaching of the gospel. And yet, the advocacy and defense of a question which has drawn around it the talent, learning, ingenuity, and sophistry of centuries, is to be left to a few amiable brethren in the distribution of tracts. Far from me to detract from tract distribution, or amiability of character, or prayers in secret places. There is evidently an impression somewhat prevalent, that any thing like disputation must be unfavorable to piety, devotion, or religion. I would inquire, whether such be the fact. Does not that notion arise from a sickly sentimentalism, which has so far pervaded community, that it demands a gospel of the character of a general atonement, without any particular application?

S. S. Griswold.

P. S.—At some future time I propose to give a short account of some Sabbath Lectures in Jefferson County, N. Y., by Elders Crandall and Sawyer, the former an agent of the American Sabbath Tract Society.

THE SULTAN AND THE PROTESTANTS.

It has been asserted, on high authority, that one cause of the rupture between Russia and Turkey is the leniency of the latter power towards Protestants residing within its dominions. If so, the triumph or defeat of the Sultan is vitally connected with the interests of Protestantism. The following "Firman of the Sultan, granted in favor of his Protestant subjects," indicates a very liberal and correct sentiment on his part:—

Most honored vizier, illustrious counsellor, maintainer of the good order of the world, director of public affairs with wisdom and judgment, accomplisher of the important transactions of mankind with intelligence and good sense, consolidator of the edifice of empire and of glory, endowed by the Most High with abundant gifts, and Moushir, at this time, of my gate of felicity, my Vizier Mehemed Pacha, may God be pleased to preserve him long in exalted dignity.

Let it be known on the receipt of this my noble rescript, that:—Whereas, those of my Christian subjects who have embraced the Protestant faith, have suffered inconveniences and difficulties, in consequence of their not having been hitherto placed under a separate and special jurisdiction, and in consequence of the Patriarchs and Primates of their old creeds, which they have abandoned, not being naturally able to administer their affairs. Whereas, in necessary accordance with my imperial solicitude and benevolence toward all classes of my subjects, it is contrary to my imperial pleasure that any class of them should be exposed to trouble. And whereas, by reason of their faith, the aforesaid Protestants form a separate community. It is in consequence my royal pleasure, that measures be taken for the sole purpose of facilitating the administration of their affairs, so that they may live in peace, quiet and security. Let then a respectable and trusworthy person, chosen by themselves from among their own number, be appointed, with the title of "Agent of the Protestants," to be attached to the Department of the Minister of Police. It shall be the duty of the agent to take charge of the register of the members of the community, and which is to be kept at the police department. The agent is to register therein all births and deaths. All applications for passports and marriage licenses, and on those special affairs of the community which are to come before the Sublime Porte, or any other department, are to be made under the official seal of the agent.

The present royal and august edict has been especially granted and issued from my Imperial chancery, for carrying my pleasure into execution. Hence thou, the above-indicated Moushir, shall carry the preceding ordinance into scrupulous execution, conformably with the explanations given. As, however, the assessment of taxes and the delivery of passports are subject to specific regulations, thou shalt not permit anything to be done in contravention thereto. Thou shalt not suffer any tax or haratch to be required of the Protestants, for marriage licenses or for registration. Thou shalt be careful that, like unto the other communities of the empire, every facility and required assistance be afforded to them in all their affairs, and in all matters concerning their cemeteries and places of worship. Thou shalt not permit any interference whatsoever, on the part of any other community, with their rights or with their religious concerns, nor, in short, with any of their affairs, either secular or religious, in any manner whatsoever; in order that they may be enabled to exercise the usages of their faith in security. Thou shalt not suffer them to be molested one iota in these or in any other matters; and thou shalt be careful and attentive to maintain them in the desired quiet and security. They are to be permitted to make those representations to the Sublime Porte which it may be necessary to make concerning their affairs, through their agent. After thou hast taken due cognizance of these matters, thou shalt cause the present noble rescript to be registered in the proper quarter, and shalt cause it to be confirmed in the possession of the aforesaid subjects, and thou shalt be careful that the high provisions thereof be always carried into due execution. Thus be it known unto thee, giving full credence to the Imperial signet. Done in the second decade of the sacred month of Moharrem, in the year of the Hegira 1264, at Constantinople the well-guarded.

EVANGELICAL LABORS IN IRELAND.

Under date of London, August 11, 1853, the British correspondent of the New York Evangelist gives the following account of an effort in the way of volunteer preaching in Ireland:—

The spiritual destitution of Ireland has long engaged the thoughts of some of the leading members of the Evangelical Alliance, and Dr. Steane, one of its Honorary Secretaries, having recently visited that country, conceived the idea that an extemporary mission to its Southern counties—Cork, Kerry, Limerick, Tipperary, Kilkenny, and Waterford—might be productive of signal benefits. The plan was for one hundred ministers to preach the gospel for a month, both on the Sabbath and on other days, throughout that district. The good doctor imagined that the gospel preached by ministers from England and Scotland, and of different denominations, would exhibit a united Protestantism, which would remove the reproach of sectarian division, and come with greater weight upon the public mind as a united testimony. It was proposed that each minister engaged should preach five sermons a week, which, in the month, would be an aggregate of two thousand sermons. The voluntary services of a hundred British ministers were secured, and a large sum for their traveling expenses raised, and the last Sunday in July was the day appointed to commence the enterprise. The associated brethren went forth "two and two" to their respective stations, but have been met in all the large towns by the most brutal levity, insolence, and persecution. At Limerick, a mob of 3,000 people assailed them; and the whole police force of the district was scarcely equal to keep them from being torn in pieces by the ruffians. Going before the magistrates, the majority of whom were Romanists, not a sentence was elicited from the bench in condemnation of so cowardly an attack. A Roman Catholic barrister was allowed to say, without reproof, "These men may bless their stars that some of them have not received the crown of martyrdom—and that the log-net men are not dragging the river for their bodies this morning." Bursts of savage laughter followed these murderous suggestions. At Waterford, the ministers were treated with the same barbarity; they accordingly published a placard, headed "Liberty of Speech," and appealed to the Irish, as the professed friends of civil and religious liberty, to give them fair play. One passage of the address I transcribe, as worthy of regard on both sides of the Atlantic: "Little did the friends of freedom imagine, when contending for the political emancipation of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, that they were placing power in the hands of those that would fetter their own liberties, and would not act on the Christian principle of doing unto others as they wish others to do to them." But even this did not moderate their violence, and they were obliged to retire before the storm. At Nenag, according to the testimony of a Roman Catholic paper, "much hooting and merriment were indulged, and some mud was thrown; and in the jostling that took place, one of 'the saints' was crowned with a dung-basket!" In Clonmel, the capital of Tipperary, the brethren were met with similar treatment. A crowd of at least 4,000 persons assembled, and the moment Dr. Gordon began to read the Scriptures, a scene of hissing, yelling, grinning, totally indescribable, ensued. Small stones, cabbage, and other missiles, were thrown, and the ministers were rescued from the greatest peril by the efforts of the police. Such is the religious liberty the Papists of Ireland allow to Protestant Dissenters, who helped them to gain their political freedom! Several of our brethren have returned in disgust. The tone of exultation in the Popish journals is most intolerant and insulting. They rejoice in these brutal attacks, much as the craftsmen of Ephesus did at the persecution of Paul. But these excesses, whether in Ireland or Canada, cannot fail to work for the furtherance of the gospel, in spite of the malignant hostility of its enemies.

Sunday Always.—By different nations every day in the week is set apart for public worship; Sunday by Christians; Monday by the Greeks; Tuesday by the Persians; Wednesday by the Assyrians; Thursday by the Egyptians; Friday by the Turks; Saturday by the Jews. Add to this the diurnal revolutions, and it is apparent that every moment is Sunday somewhere.

☞The above paragraph is going the rounds of the papers. By some persons it is regarded as evincing the folly of insisting upon one particular day of the week as the Sabbath, to the exclusion of all the others. To us, however, it evinces the necessity of insisting upon that the importance of uniformity in the matter of sabbatizing, is generally admitted. But how is uniformity to be attained? Not by allowing each man, or each nation, to determine what particular day shall be observed, but by following the directions of One who has a right to dictate to all men and all nations. God has said, "The seventh day is the Sabbath—in it thou shalt not do any work." Universal obedience to that command would produce all desirable uniformity, as the practice of Jews in different parts of the world proves. General disobedience to that command has produced the confusion above alluded to.

Gerrit Smith.—A letter of Gerrit Smith to W. L. Crandall, dated Peterboro, Nov. 6, says:—

"Your letter finds me suffering under a rush of blood to the head. It is a fortnight since the disease began. I fear that it may disqualify me for my official duties."

To this a Syracuse paper adds:—

"If the prayers and deep regrets of millions can avail, Mr. Smith's fears will prove groundless, and he will be in his seat at the opening of Congress."

"All Right."—The following extract from a business letter of Eld. N. V. Hull will relieve the minds of any of our readers who were apprehensive that the churches were to be deprived of the labors of that brother:—

"Election is over, and I am elected to stay at home—by a large majority. All right."

A Methodist Missionary is to leave soon for Norway.

General Intelligence.

European News.

We have one week later news from Europe the substance of which will be found below.

A frightful accident happened on the River Medway, near Tunbridge Wells, Eng., on the 21st ult., by which nearly 40 persons perished. In consequence of the Medway having overflowed its banks, a number of hop-pickers, after having finished their day's work, were being conveyed through the flood in a wagon drawn by three horses, when, on arriving at Hartlake Bridge, they became alarmed at the rush of water, and uttered loud cries. The party consisted of men, women and children. The noise they made alarmed the horses, who, it appears, ran away and came in contact with the side of the bridge, which, being in a dilapidated state, broke down, and the wagon was precipitated into the river, and all the persons in it drowned. Thirty-seven persons were missing.

A telegraphic dispatch gives news of the 17th from the Turkish frontiers. At that date no act of hostility had taken place. The Russian and Ottoman Generals were concentrating their troops, and Omar Pasha appeared to be preparing to cross the Danube.

A telegraphic dispatch published in the Paris Moniteur, dated Bucharest, 25th October, states that two Russian steamers with eight gunboats forced the passage of the Danube on the 23d, and encountered a brisk fire from the Turkish fort at Isaktchi, between Reni and Ismail. The Russians had one colonel, three officers, and twelve sailors killed, and forty wounded, but pretend that they set the fort on fire by a shell.

A letter from St. Petersburg of the 14th October, states that news of the declaration of war by the Porte had produced a painful sensation, and the character of the Czar, adds the writer, is not of a nature to bend when a challenge is offered to him. In the north of Russia the army and the civil officers are for war, while the reports from the south were more pacific. The movement of troops and the stagnation of trade had depressed public opinion. No warlike enthusiasm had displayed itself, although various official publications had been circulated to inflame it. The population to the south of Moscow desired peace. The soldiers and Commissaries alone called for war.

Notwithstanding all the unfavorable symptoms, public opinion, both in London and Paris, had taken a favorable turn. The belief was pretty generally advanced, that the resources of diplomacy were not all exhausted, and that whatever may be the real or affected irritation of the Emperor Nicholas, Europe will be saved the horrors of war. Turkey and Russia may be permitted to exchange blows, but it was thought the mediating powers would still be able to prevent them from merging into extended hostilities, or a general war on the Continent.

The overland India, China and Australian mails had arrived with dates from Calcutta, Sept. 20, Hong Kong, Sept. 9. The British acquisitions in Burmah were again in a state of war, being overrun by large bodies of armed men, said to exceed 14,000 in number, who occupied fortified positions, whence they attacked the English posts. They were said to be instigated by the King of Aya, and a resumption of hostilities was considered inevitable. The revolution in China still continued. At Amoy the Imperialists had had some success, but the Patriots had invested Khai-fung-foo, the capital of Honan, on the Yellow River. The whole country was in a state of anarchy, and trade at a stand still.

The Chinese Revolution.—From China advices have been received of a favorable character. The missionaries meet with little or no opposition from the people of the rural districts, but only from the inhabitants of Canton. The rebel chiefs are actively engaged in distributing tracts. Rev. Charles Taylor is now on his trip to their camp, and Rev. Mr. Roberts is in company with him, hoping to reach the chief, who was once Mr. R.'s catechumen and guest at Canton. It would seem that this chief gained his first religious knowledge—his first knowledge of Christianity—from a tract entitled "Good Words to admonish the Age," or some similar one, many years ago, while a student at Canton, and that for having embraced these new doctrines, he was ejected from his place of a school teacher. Friendless and penniless he came to Mr. Roberts, with whom he remained some months in the spring or summer of 1847. Subsequently he and his fellows were persecuted, and two of them put to death. The others, and this chief among the rest, were driven to make resistance. Hence, apparently, the origin of the great movement.

The Labors of Dr. Judson.—The London Christian Spectator, in an article on the life and services of Dr. Judson, says that he gave thirty-eight years of manly toil for the redemption of a people who robbed him, loaded him with fetters, cast him into dungeons and death prisons, and drove him barefooted over burning sands;" he consecrated at one time fifteen hundred, and at another five thousand dollars, received for literary and linguistic labors, to the mission cause; translated the whole Bible into the second most complicated language of the East; compiled the first dictionary, a very voluminous work, in the same tongue; never dreaming, and apparently of so guileless a spirit that he never seems to have thought of it, that by these prodigious labors and endurances, he was laying the foundation of a world-wide celebrity; and finally died, as a good, great man, would desire to die, in exultant persuasion of a better life beyond the grave.

"Sunday Corn."—Under this head a correspondent of the Boston Investigator, a paper "devoted to the development and promotion of universal mental liberty," gives the following suggestive paragraph:—

"My two acres of Sunday Corn, that I promised to raise for the purpose of buying Liberal Books with the proceeds of the sale, I have not harvested yet, but I think it will yield about seventy bushels per acre. It stands about twelve feet high, and all the work upon it was done on Sunday. I don't see but what Nature or Providence has smiled upon my Sunday work, though the priests tell us that no labor performed on that day ever prospers. My two acres of corn tell another story."

New York State Election.—The New York State Election resulted in the choice of a Legislature which, it is believed, will recognize the necessity of passing a Prohibitory Liquor Law. The following are the State Officers elected:—

Elias W. Leavenworth, Secretary of State, Syracuse.
James M. Cook, Controller, Balston Spa.
Elbridge G. Spaulding, Treasurer, Buffalo.
Ogden Hoffman, Attorney General, New York City.
Cornelius Gardinier, Canal Com., Amsterdam.
John T. Clark, State Engineer, Utica.
Thomas Kirkpatrick, Prison Inspector, Albany.
Benj. F. Harwood, Clerk of Appeals, Genesee.
The Judge of Appeals are Charles H. Ruggles, Poughkeepsie, and Hiram Denio, Utica.

Tax Sale at Albany.—We have received (says the N. Y. Tribune) a catalogue of 400 pages, indicating an immense number of lots of land in all parts of the State, now sold, or about to be sold, for arrears of taxes, at the Capitol at Albany. The sale commenced on Wednesday, the 9th instant, and must occupy all of the present and most of the coming month. This is a very extensive sale; the last by the State under the old law. The first day was devoted to sales of lots in the City and County of Albany, and nearly completed, the purchase being confined to Chester Packard and William D. Carrol, of Albany; Ex-Mayor Baldwin of Syracuse; City of Albany; and a few others. The amount of tax due on any one parcel is generally small, and the average bids were about 50-100ths of the property advertised for the tax; to be paid within 48 hours; subject to redemption within two years, by payment of costs, with tax and 10 per cent. interest.

"The Murder Crop."—Under this head, the N. Y. Tribune says that there are now waiting for trial for murder before the Court of Oyer and Terminer in this City, eighteen persons! The worst feature in the matter is, that the prisoners are described generally as respectable looking men. Their names are: Louis De Corn, for shooting Eugene Melville; Cornelius Collins, Timothy Hogan, James McArdle, and Albert A. Bogart, for killing William Stafford, in French's Hotel; James Smith, for stabbing James Davis; James Fox, William Dinan, John Wade, and Edmund Mahoney, for killing Henry Osborne; James L. Hoare, causing the death of Susan McAnnany; Woodson Anderson, colored man, for killing John Branagan; Thomas Kine, for killing his wife with an ax—said to be a lunatic; John Doscher, for killing Pat rick McNulty; Charles Thomas, for killing Michael Lawler; John Price, for killing Samuel Freeman; Augustus Kreutzer, for killing John Daniel Kotting; Henry Carnel, for murder. There were during a period of a year lately as many murders, save two, committed in the City of New York as were in all England in the same period!

SUMMARY.

Three persons, two Sonorians and one Californian, accused of murder and robbery, were hung by Lynch law, on the 9th Oct., at San Luis Obispo, Cal. They were arrested, tried and convicted, by the citizens of Los Angeles, but the Spanish citizens outnumbered in the meeting the Americans, who wished to hang the prisoners. The Californians were opposed to Lynch law, and it is said were determined to resist its execution at all costs. The meeting then determined to send the prisoners to San Luis Obispo, where the crimes were committed. The prisoners were accordingly sent by the steamer Goliah to that place, and immediately upon their arrival they were seized and hung by a party of Americans, who were on the beach.

Every six years, by law, there is a revaluation of the real estate of Ohio for taxation. The last valuation was in 1847, when the entire taxable property of the State, at cash values, amounted to about $475,000,000. The returns for the new valuation are nearly complete, and the Auditor of State estimates that they will vary but slightly from $800,000,000; showing an increase of taxables in six years of $325,000,000, or nearly 70 per cent. Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Kentucky and Tennessee will probably show an equal increase in the same period. A large part of this increase may be justly imputed to the completion of the railroads in the West, every one of which, now in operation, is paying largely.

Three fugitive slaves, from Virginia, passed through Elmira, N. Y., recently, on their way to Canada. They belonged, originally, to a gentleman of Richmond; but on his death were given their freedom, on condition they would emigrate to Africa. This they refused to do, and so they were immediately hired out to different individuals, by their present owners. Fearful that they might be sold to some planter down South, they resolved to run off. When they arrived at Elmira they were almost naked, and without shoes to their feet, but through the liberality of some of their colored friends, they were comfortably clad, and sent on their way rejoicing.

A dispatch dated Washington, Nov. 8, 1853, says:—Application has been made to this government to annex Honduras to the United States, but no answer has yet been returned. The Hondurenes are rather bothered by their war with Guatamala and the controversy they have on hand with England about the Bay Islands and other matters. They accordingly would like to transfer themselves to the United States, and as an inducement offer a country very rich in silver and other metals, and possessing the most advantageous line for an inter-oceanic railroad that can be found out of the United States.

The earnings of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad in October, 1853, were $9,722 for passengers, and $31,605 for freight, making a total of $41,397. The earnings in the same month of 1852 were $15,072. In October last year the Road was in operation to Whitewater, 50 miles from Milwaukee. It is now running to Janesville, 70 miles from Milwaukee. The increase is nearly 200 per cent. over that of October, 1852. An additional section of the Road to Stoughton, Dane County, 18 miles further, will be completed during the next week.

We learn from the New Hampshire Telegraph, that C. G. Atherton, U. S. Senator, was taken with a paralytic shock, while in the Court at Manchester, on Thursday, and at the last account his left side was paralyzed, and he was unable to talk. While engaged in conversation, he was observed to falter, and said that he was faint. He was led out of the Court Room, but before reaching his hotel he had lost the use of one side entirely, and was obliged to be carried.

The Commissioners in the case of the Northern Indiana and Chicago Railroad Company vs. the Illinois Central Railroad Company, have decided that the track of the Central Railroad Company shall cross the track of the complainants at the same point as hitherto, but that the crossing shall be by means of a bridge, which shall be built by the defendants at least eighteen feet in the clear above the surface of the rails of the complainants. The bridge must be built immediately, and until finished the railroad of the defendants will be allowed to cross the track at grade.

The Potosi Republican says: One of the most valuable discoveries of mineral, perhaps, ever found in this prolific lead region, has recently been made by a couple of Germans named Gilser and Fishernick, over on Preston Point, about two miles east of Potosi. The land is owned by Governor Dewey; we are informed from forty to fifty thousand pounds of mineral can easily be taken out in one day. The discoverers have already been offered one thousand dollars for a third, which they refused.

On Cleland's Cleveland and Pittsburg Express train, a singular accident occurred. A dispatch dated Buffalo, Monday, Nov. 7, 1853, says the suspension of Patchin's Bank is announced. Mr. Patchin, the President of the Bank, is also the President of the Railroad, and has assumed liabilities which, in consequence of the difficulty in disposing of the Bonds and Securities of the Road, has resulted in the dishonor of the Bank Bills, which are, however, abundantly secured with the Banking Department.

Miscellaneous.

The Expedition to Japan.

The Washington Sentinel publishes the following interesting extracts from a letter written by a distinguished officer of the U. S. Navy to his wife, resident in Washington.

Friday, July 8, 1853.

Here we are in the harbor of Jeddo, after running over nearly 30,000 miles of various seas and of various climes—here at anchor four miles higher up the bay than has ever yet anchored [illegible], bearing a Christian flag. We anchored at [illegible] P. M., and soon large boats, rowed cheerily with about twenty men, and in each some [illegible]ps, or gentlemen, with two swords, neat and well dressed, came swarming off with determination fell to come on board, demanding the names, the nation, and the intentions of the four craft thus coming boldly in, in joy and [illegible]. They were met with a wave of the hand, and "keep off, no one allowed to come on board save the highest mandarin." This literally took them all aback, but they clustered together and insisted upon admittance. At last a voice said in Dutch, "Do you speak Hollandese?" Soon the Commodore's Clerk, Mr. Postman, was in high confab.

After much persuasion on their part, and their insisting that one of them was a high mandarin, the Commodore ordered me to put on my uniform, and to receive him and the interpreter on board in the cabin, and to represent himself, stating that our mission is a friendly one, we are the bearers of a letter from the President of the United States to his Majesty of Japan; that it was necessary to send on board a high mandarin to receive this letter, and the sooner the better. Again, I was to insist upon it that boats should not lie, by the hundreds, near and around our ships, thus guarding and watching us, as has been their custom. (The Columbus and Vincennes having from five hundred to one thousand boats around them constantly, all linked together.) That we would not submit to this, but would drive them off. Here you have the basis of my instructions. Thus armed, I took Mr. Mandarin and interpreter, with my two interpreters—Mr. Williams, in Chinese, and Mr. Postman, in Dutch—into the cabin.

After being seated a moment, Mr. Mandarin arose, made a salaam a la Japanese, and then extending his hand, we shook hands; then seated ourselves, using Mr. Postman as interpreter, as the Japanese interpreter spoke Dutch fluently. I thus opened: "Tell the Lieut. Governor (for such was the mandarin) that I am the aid of our chief, the admiral, and am instructed to speak for him. We have come here on a friendly mission, with friendly intentions, to deliver a letter from the President of the United States to your sovereign, the Emperor of Japan; that the letter is ready for delivery by 9 o'clock to-morrow, to any mandarin sufficiently high to receive it." To this he replied: "It must be referred to higher powers to know who can receive the letter." I then asked, "How long will it take to give an answer?" They could not tell. I said, "I think the sooner the better, as we are anxious to be off." The reply was, "I do not think it will take long;" and it was then understood that, in the morning, a mandarin would come off to receive the letter.

I then emphatically said: "This ship has aboard the chief—there is his pennant. All messages from shore must come here by a high mandarin. No boats must go to the other ships. Their commanders have orders not to permit intercourse; they have no right to think, and must obey. We insist that no boats shall hang around our vessels to watch them." This was not palatable. They said: "It is Japanese custom, law, and we must carry them out." Says I: "Tell him, Sir, that we too have our customs, and with men-of-war one of the laws is that no boat is allowed to come within a certain range." There was no positive consent given just then as to what they would do; they evaded it by asking questions. "Where are you from?" "From the United States of America." "Yes; but what part—Washington, New York, Boston?" My surprise was so great that I smiled and told him, "Some from Washington, some from New York; all parts: that the President of the United States lived in Washington." "What is the name of the ship, how many people, guns, &c.?" "Tell him, Sir, that we are not traders, we seek no trade, we are armed ships, and our custom is never to answer such questions."

The questions were again repeated in pretty much the same way, when I told Mr. P. to make the same reply, and to add that I had no curiosity to know how many men are either in the Emperor's army or in his navy; and also that he could see for himself that we had four ships, that we had others in these waters. "When will the others come?" "I don't know; it depends upon the answer to the letter." "What are the contents of the letter?" "Tell him, Sir, that the letter is from the President to the Emperor of Japan, and it would be most indelicate in me to inquire into its contents." This rebuke was received in an apologetic manner, and this questioning dropped. I then again alluded to the boats which were still clustering around our ship and the other ships; told him that it was absolutely necessary that they should be kept off; that this must be done. "We shall be sorry, with our kind and friendly feelings to you, to do you any harm, or to come into collision with you; but, if you do not order your boats off, we shall fire into them and drive them off. Our boats are now armed and ready, and we cannot allow you more than fifteen minutes to give your orders and keep them off. At the end of that time you must suffer."

Mr. Mandarin went out, told this to the boats, sent word to the other boats, and came in. "Now I must have an answer. What have you decided about the boats?" "I have ordered them off from all the ships, and with orders only to communicate with this. Yes, from all the ships; and if any come around you, send word to the Governor, and he will punish them." Thus was this point, never before yielded, conceded. After a few more remarks, I bowed Mr. Mandarin off, and away he went on shore, taking the boats off with him.

My interview with my friend was again renewed in the evening, and in rather a different phase, which does not promise to open so peacefully; but to-morrow will tell. At present I am too tired, having been up all day from an early hour—and here we are, too, our pistols loaded, our swords ready at hand, armed men and sentinels patrolling the decks, guns loaded, and trained and cast loose; for we lie down to sleep to-night in the neighborhood of 10,000,000 of men, brave, enterprising, ready, never conquered. It behooves us to be watchful. So I will to bed, and rest.

Sunday, July 11, A. M.—Let me renew my narrative of the events of the 8th. In about one hour after the mandarin left, I again received him with directions not to palaver much. In a long, windy, set speech, he said that the Governor did not feel himself justified in receiving the letter from the President to the Emperor—that he had not the power—that Nagasaki was the place for the conduct of all foreign affairs—that it was not Japanese custom—that indeed the Governor was much bothered to think why four ships should have come together—that he appreciated very highly the great trouble we had taken to come so very far to deliver the letter, but, that he could not receive it. To which I replied: "The distance, to be sure, was very long, and we had come a great way—that we could not think of going to Nagasaki—that the letter was an important one, and that our President had ordered us to deliver it as near the city of Jeddo as possible; therefore we were here, and I trusted that this letter would be received in the morning."

To this he answered: "No one here can receive it. It would bring harm upon him—Nagasaki is the only place—that he did not believe if the letter was received that the Emperor would answer it." To this I replied: "Does your Governor dare to take upon him self the responsibility to refuse to receive a letter written to his Sovereign, and to forward it to him? It is a very grave responsibility to refuse to receive the letter sent from one Sovereign to another." He then said: "The Governor may receive it, but we can't tell when the answer may come;" but then added, "that he had not the power to receive it, and must wait and refer it."

I replied that "this letter was a very important one—that it would be a great insult to the President of the United States not to receive it. That as to the Emperor's not answering it, that was not our business now; that would be settled after." He said, "This is Japanese custom; you Americans don't ununderstand Japanese customs," &c. I replied, "We Americans do business decidedly, promptly." At this point I went out, and referred this new phase of the discussion to the Commodore, and by his order I broke up the interview, telling him that if the Governor did not send off for the letter in the morning, we would ourselves deliver it in the town of Orogama." He was rather taken aback by this decision, and requested permission to come off in the morning. To this I assented. He then took his leave. Before going off he stepped back to our long gun aft, which is all clear, and showing its massive proportions, and examining it, said, looking interrogatorily, "Paixhan?" If he has an acquaintance with "Paixhan," I trust it is from reading, and not from practice.

At six o'clock the next morning I was called on deck to receive the mandarin; so I dressed hurriedly and went up. There was the same story, but he proposed to send to Jeddo for permission. We gave him until Thursday, at 12 o'clock, saying, "If the letter was not received, we would regard it as an insult to the President, and act accordingly." So it rests.

July 17.—One week has passed since I have written a word, and a week of much excitement, and great events. And here we are, thank Heaven, safe; and in nine days we have effected much—so much, that the world will be gratified, and our country feel herself honored. We have landed in Japan, within twenty-five miles of Jeddo, with armed troops and armed men, and delivered our credentials, and the President's letter, to Commissioners—two Princes, one a Councillor of the realm, and appointed by his Majesty to receive us. But I am ahead of events, and must more leisurely detail the interviews, arrangements, &c., which led to an issue so happy, so peaceful, so desirable, and which have reflected much eclat upon the firmness and wisdom of Commodore Perry. He has certainly selected a course of conduct which reflects great credit upon himself.

I left off by telling you that we had given Tezimon, Governor, or highest authority in Uraga, or, by his other title, "the learned scholar who rides," until Thursday at twelve o'clock, to get an answer from Jeddo to our propositions; that is, that the copies of the letters and credentials, with a letter of the Commodore's inclosed, were to be received by a high mandarin, accredited by his master to receive them. On Monday we were to receive information from him of the advancement of matters. On that morning he came off quite pleased, and said that he thought the letters would be received. By the by, we showed him the letter, which is beautifully done up in a case, and the seal enclosed in a gold box, costing $1000; so also with the Commodore's credentials. We had talked and palavered over matters, answering many questions, and among others, diplomatizing about the propriety of surveying the harbor, &c., for in the morning, the boats well armed, with the Mississippi to guard them, had preceded her up the bay, and had advanced ten miles nearer to Jeddo, finding plenty of water, and a fine, large, capacious, magnificent harbor; when it has always been supposed that Uraga was about as far as vessels of any size could go, so great is the mystery that hangs around this land.

On the advance of the boats, the forts were armed, the dungaree and canvas screens, behind which rested the pikes of the soldiery, fairly flapped with anger, and armed boats, with about twenty-five men each, started out from every point by the hundreds, looking defiance; but onward went our little boats, throwing their leads and marking the soundings, and steadily advanced the Mississippi on her purpose. Our steam was up, and all the vessels hove short to slip and run to their assistance, and throw into the Japanese forts, dungaree, cotton, boats and all, a few paixhan shell. My opinion is, that for these thirty-six hours, (and more particularly for these six,) the Japanese hesitated whether or not they should at once resist and try with us the fortunes of war. But so steady was our determination, both in council and in conduct, so utterly careless of any action on their part, so perfectly confident of our resources and power, and so regardless of all danger, that they were paralyzed, and prudent and friendly measures were decided.

It is well to remark here, that they have been making the most extensive preparations of forts, &c., lately, as is evident by their new works, and those not yet finished. Doubtless, there are full 1,000 boats, averaging, with rowers and soldiers, 25 men. In these waters we have seen, and could have counted, 500; some on the water, their banners flying, 40 and 50 together; others hauled on the beach, ready to launch out—at first mistaken for villages. But a new era has been marked in their history; they have been placed on the defensive; they dared not begin the game, though I yet believe that any harsh measures on our part, or encroachment or injury, would cause a determined and bloody resistance; for they are a free, frank, pleasing, sociable, fearless people, and would stand bravely to the slaughter. These traits may be expected in a land where "the wives and mothers are proverbially virtuous"—the exception being the rariety and proving the rule. Well will it be if we can make these people our friends and our allies. Yes, heretofore they have arrogantly dictated to all others, but with us the game is changed. We have said, So must you do—this is our way. These steamers, too, moving without sails against wind and tide, have struck, if not terror, at least wonder and wisdom into their souls.

But to the interviews. This of Monday evening ended. Tuesday morning, about noon, they again came off, and our "learned scholar" evidently wore a more contented air. He told us that the letters would be received; that the Emperor was going to send down a high prince and a councillor to take them. "When?" "On day after to-morrow." We are putting up a new house to receive you, and it cannot be ready before then; nor will the prince be down until to-morrow." It was now that we understood that they expected to receive the letter of the President, and the Commodore's letter of credence, instead of the copies which it was the intention to send first, reserving the last in the hopes of forcing an interview at Jeddo. This was explained to them—when the change that came over them was plain—they persisted that they had understood that the letters were to be received, not the copies—the fear of the permission to rip himself up (the Hari Kasi) was evident in his face—yet the Commodore persisted in this point, and we sent him off to give notice to higher powers that such was the fact.

In the afternoon he again came, and the Commodore at last agreed to deliver the originals and land at the place fixed upon.

Thursday, July 14.—Early in the morning we dropped our steamers down and near in as possible. The bay is very nearly circular, with two small forts on each point of the entrance. We went off in our boats, (in all,) officers, landsmen and marines, 428 strong, armed to the teeth; each man carrying with him the lives of five Japanese. It was a beautiful sight as we pulled in. We were in sight of a hundred armed Japanese boats, with banners flying, averaging twenty-five men each; then on the shores ahead were stretched lines of painted cloths, with various mottoes, for a full mile in length—armed men and cavalry and artillery in front, and human figures, thick in the rear. On advanced our boats, and our little band landed; drew up in line and formed, in all, on shore 350 men, leaving 80 in the boats.

The Commodore and staff then landing, we formed a close line, and, to the tune of "Hail Columbia," with the American flag proudly waving over us, we marched up to the council-house. There we halted, our little band drew up, and thus, with twenty feet between us, face to face, stood the sons of America, and the troops of Japan. We went into the council-house, where sat the Commissioner, with his coädjutor, Prince of Iwami. Proudly we walked in, and bowed in our way, which was returned by the Commissioner rising and bowing. We were then seated. Thus we delivered the credentials, and, after a few words, we withdrew, formed our line, and, to the tunes of "Hail Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle," retired to our boats. We were accompanied off by Tezemon and other mandarins, and got under way and proceeded up the bay. We went within eight miles of Jeddo, carrying plenty of water, but could see nothing of the city.

Best Fowls for Farmers.

My blooded fowls do not prove equally profitable; the Polands, being yarded and well fed, having lime and gravel, and a little fresh meat, have laid more eggs than most other varieties; but when without meat the eggs have been few.

My Bolton Greys have eat little and laid well, without setting; but several litters of their chickens have all been taken by the rats, and I have labored in vain to raise any, where rats could get to them.

The Golden Pheasants are more beautiful, have laid almost continually, and none of their chickens have been taken, though running upon the same ground with the Greys. The Grey chicks are weakly, while the Pheasants are too sprightly to be caught.

Guilderlands, after being with a cock of another variety, produced half breeds at first; but the second litter was obviously pure. They lay the largest eggs, though less in number, and propagate their marks of purity like a wild original breed.

The Black Shanghais I find no demand for, nor any satisfactory specification of their faults, leaving us to reflect upon their likeness to an unfortunate race. The Dominique or Grey Shanghais seem every way valuable. The White are delicate, and do not rear as well. I had 7 chickens hatch from 60 eggs, and 5 of them lived; while nearly all of the buff color hatched and are doing well.

I can discover no superior utility in the longer legs and necks of the Cochin Chinas, yet their great size and other faultless qualities, speak volumes in their praise. Of the eight varieties which I breed, the Buff Shanghais (sometimes called red, sometimes yellow) I like the best. With me they have reared the best, even the common dunghill not excepted. They have laid a good number of large eggs, of the best quality, and have nursed their broods well. Those of the best stock weigh from 8 to 10 pounds. One of my breeders weighed $8\frac{1}{2}$ pounds, another $9\frac{1}{2}$ pounds. If the farmer who has not yards for separate breeding, would supplant all others with this variety, it could not fail to increase his income. And when the hen fever shall be past, and its high prices fall away, his chickens in common market would sell, not for a shilling, but for half a dollar, and would give a proportionable supply of the finest meat at home. Who would have thought, six years ago, that the laws of the States of the Union would have to be published in English and Chinese, for general circulation? Yet it is so. The ninth section of an act passed by the California Legislature for the collection of the foreign miner's tax has been printed in the Chinese language, for the information of more than thirty thousand Chinese in the new State. Tong'k Achich, a Chinaman, certifies that the translation is "faithful and good."

A Lesson in Grammar.

Of parts of speech, grammarians say,
The number is but nine,
Whether we speak of men or things,
Hear, see, smell, feel, or dine.

And first we'll speak of that called Noun,
Because on it are founded
All the ideas we receive,
And principles are grounded.

A noun's the name in any thing,
Of person, place, or nation;
As man and tree, and all we see
That stand still or have motion.

The Articles are A and The,
By which these nouns we limit;
A tree, the man, a pot, the pan,
A spoon with which to skim it.

The Adjective then tells the kind
Of everything called Noun:
Good boys or bad, girls glad or sad,
A large or a small town.

The Nouns can also agents be,
And Verbs express their actions;
Boys run and walk, girls laugh and talk,
Read, write, tell wholes or fractions.

To modify those Verbs again,
The Adverb fits most neatly;
As James correctly always writes,
And Jane she sings so sweetly.

The Pronoun shortens what we say,
And takes the place of names,
With I, thou, he, she, we, you, they,
Where sentences we frame.

Conjunctions next we bring to join
These sentences together;
As John and James may go to town,
If it should prove good weather.

With Nouns and Pronouns we have need
To use the Preposition;
Which set before or placed between,
Expresses their position.

The Interjection helps to express
Our joy and sorrow too,
As when we shout hurrah! or cry,
Alas! what shall we do?

Curious Facts.

A London letter in the National Intelligencer, contains some very remarkable facts respecting the population of Great Britain, which we condense thus:—

The returns of the population of Great Britain, according to the census of 1850, have at length been published, in part, in two very thick folio volumes. A third folio volume, of three hundred pages, consists of an index to the other two volumes. The labor of collecting this information was immense; 620 superintendent registrars, 2,190 registrars, and 20,610 enumerators, were employed in England and Wales, and in Scotland 1,010 superintendents and 7,873 enumerators. Jailors, masters of work-houses, naval and military officers, clergymen, school-masters, and officers of public institutions, all assisted in supplying this information. By this large array of workers, the whole of the population returns of Great Britain were collected in one day, so that the mere expense of procuring the returns was comparatively small.

The remainder of the time, from that day to the beginning of the present month, was occupied with arranging the returns for the press and in printing them. Seven millions of forms were printed, and the weight of all the papers sent from the central office exceeded fifty-two tons. The most striking and important information which it contains, is the certain fact of the continual increase of the people since 1801, when the practice of taking a decennial census commenced. Prior to that time the number of people was conjectural, or ascertained by the loosest and most vague calculation. At the close of the eighteenth century, it was supposed that the population doubled itself in one hundred and sixty years. Earlier records, however, very conclusively show that the population took the whole of the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, or three hundred years, to double itself.

Of the progress of population previous to the fifteenth century, nothing satisfactory is known. The best writers on the subject have concluded that at the time of the Conquest, the population of England and Wales did not exceed 2,000,000, "of whom," says Sharon Turner, "nearly three-fourths were in a state of slavery, and nothing could have broken their bonds but such events as the Norman Conquest and the civil wars which it excited and fostered." In 1801 Great Britain, which had been peopled at least twenty centuries, contained a population of 10,917,433 persons; in 1851 the population is ascertained to have been, 21,121,967—being nearly doubled of what it was in 1801; therefore, during the fifty intervening years the increase alone was nearly as much as the aggregate population which had accumulated in twenty centuries. Thus the population has done that during the last fifty years which the eleven centuries between the landing of Julius Cæsar and that of William the Conqueror, had scarcely accomplished. At the same time it might easily be shown that the wealth of the country has increased faster than its population. The 21,121,967 people in Great Britain are very unequally dispersed. In England and Wales they ~~are~~ at an average distance asunder of 108 yards. In London they are within 14 yards of each other. In East London there are 185,751 persons to a square mile; in the district of Bellingham, Northumberland, there are only 18 persons to a square mile, or in London the population of a square mile is more than ten thousand times greater than that of Bellingham. In the towns the people are 52 to a square acre, in the country there are 53 acres to each person. Placing 3 persons in every square yard, the whole population might be placed in 1,476 acres. In Great Britain there are 815 towns containing 10,566,288 persons, and 10,403,189 dwell in what, for the sake of distinction, is always called the country.

"Our Own Correspondent."

The Paris correspondent of the New York Times gives the following picture of the comforts and dignity of the "own correspondent" of the London Times:—

"Next to the berth of British Ambassador at Paris, I suppose that the post of correspondent to the London Times is most to be desired. Let me rehearse a few of the immunities and privileges of that individual. His salary is $5,000 a year. He has a handsome suit of rooms, furnished and paid for by the paper. He has two clerks constantly in his employ, who read the French journals, translate, collate, cut out items from Galignani, and add their eyes, invention, experience and observation to his. These gentlemen are paid by the Times, of course. The correspondent buys and charges to the paper any books of which he may stand in need—and the library is a very choice and complete collection of standard authors, cyclopedias, dictionaries, and other books of reference. He is empowered to pay for any important intelligence, just what it may cost.

"When the Post-office closes early, to the infinite annoyance of all us correspondents of low degree, he writes on merrily till sunset, and then hires a man to jump into the 7 o'clock train and take his letter to London! The Times pays the bill. Besides all this, his position is such that a great many things come to him, without his giving himself the trouble to go to them. Thus, a proclamation of Henry V. desires to see the light. M. Berryer sends it to the correspondent of the London Times, who gives it to one of his clerks to translate. All the other correspondents, when they see it in print, throw up their hands, and wonder how the man knew there was such a proclamation in existence, and where he went to get it. In short, it is a great thing to represent the London Times in Paris. To be able to say you are the Russian Ambassador, is one thing; to be forced to confess you are the Envoy from Venezuela, is another. To stand up and say you are the correspondent of the Times, is to locate yourself between the two, and rather nearer the top than the foot of the column."

Gov. Winthrop's Idea of Woman's Rights.—We find the following entry in the new edition of Winthrop's Journal, under the year 1643, which clearly shows the opinion of that worthy functionary, in regard to the doctrine of woman's mission. There may be a doubt whether some of the modern advocates of the largest liberty on this subject, are not obnoxious to the Governor's censure, and might not have "kept their wits if they had improved them usefully."

"Mr. Hopkins, the Governor of Hartford upon Connecticut, came to Boston, and brought his wife with him, (a godly young woman, and of special parts,) who was fallen into a sad infirmity, the loss of her understanding and reason, which had been growing upon her divers years, by occasion of her giving herself wholly to reading and writing, and had written many books. Her husband, being very loving and tender of her, was loth to grieve her; but he saw his error when it was too late. For if she had attended to her household affairs, and such things as belong to women, and not gone out of her way and calling, to meddle in such things as are proper for men, whose minds are stronger, etc., she had kept her wits, and have improved them usefully and honorably in the place God had set her. He brought her to Boston, and left her with her brother, one Mr. Yale, a merchant, to try what means might be had here for her. But no help could be had."

Curing Meats.—Cut your pork up, the sides clear of ribs, six inches wide; let it lie over night. Next day salt as follows: Sprinkle the bottom of the barrel well with coarse salt—Turk's Island or some other good kind; put in a layer of meat set on edge, packed as close together as possible; then another layer of salt, and so on, till your meat is all in the barrel. Then I take common eastern or lake salt, as it is called, and make a brine as strong as it can be made; let it stand two or three days, and then pour off the clear brine, and it is safe. Keep it under brine by placing a weight on it. One bushel of coarse salt is enough for the side meat of six good hogs.

After trying almost all methods to keep smoked hams, without success, I have for the last four years kept them with complete success by the following plan:—

Put a layer of fine dry charcoal, then a layer of hams, then charcoal, and so on. No bugs, nor skippers, nor mould, ever touch them. Keep in a dry and cool place, and they will keep perfectly sweet, if in good order when put down [Prairie Farmer.

The Traveler's Friend.—In Madagascar grows a singular tree, which, from its property of yielding water, is called "The Traveler's Friend." It differs from most other trees in having all its branches in one plane, like the sticks of a fan or the feathers of a peacock's tail. At the extremity of each grows a broad double leaf, several feet in length, which spreads itself out very gracefully. These leaves radiate heat so rapidly after sunset, that a copious deposition of dew takes place upon them, which, soon collecting into drops, forms little streams, which run down the branches to the trunk. Here it is received into hollow spaces of considerable magnitude, one of which is found at the root of every branch. These branches lie one over the other alternately, and when a knife, or, which is better, a flat piece of stick (for it is not necessary to cut the tree) is inserted between the parts which overlap, and slightly drawn to one side, so as to cause an opening, a stream of water gushes out as if from a fountain. Hence the appropriate name of "The Traveler's Friend."

Apple Jam.—The apples, which should be ripe, and of the best eating sort, being pared and quartered, as for making apple jelly, are put into a pan with water enough to cover them, and boiled until they can be reduced to a mash. Then, for each pound of the pared apples, a pound of sifted sugar is added, being sprinkled over the boiling mixture. Agitate it well until reduced to a jam; then put it into pots. The above is the most simple way of making it; but to have it of the best possible clearness, make a syrup with 3 pounds of sugar to each pint of water, and clarify it with an egg. Then add one pint of this syrup for every three pounds of apples, and boil the jam to a proper thickness.

To Clean Combs and Brushes.—To enough tepid water to cover the bristles, not the top of the brush, add a few drops of the spirits of hartshorn, an ounce of which may be had at any apothecary's for a few cents; dip the brush in several times, shaking out the water carefully, and the mixture will act like magic, leaving it clear and pure, needing only to be dried by a towel; no rubbing is needed. Combs may be done in the same way without injury. [Lady's Book.

Of the 27,737 State paupers in Massachusetts, more than 11,000 are foreigners, and nearly 10,000 are British subjects; more than 19,000 were made so by intemperance, either of themselves or guardians. The number of pauper children under fourteen years of age, 3,098.

The amount of money in active circulation in the United States is estimated in the Merchants' Magazine at $295,477,257, which, reckoning the population at 25,000,000, would make $12 per head. It was $11 in 1816 and, but $5,50 in 1830.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

THE NOBILITY OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M.D.

The lex talionis, the law of retaliation, is an inherent instinct of animal nature. It is seen in insects, in fishes, in birds, in quadrupeds, and, in its worst forms, in bipeds—in man; because we look for better things in rational beings, and because he has greater facilities to enforce his malevolence.

In reference to the human family it is, sometimes, denominated savage nature, in opposition to civilized life, and, theologically, it is called the natural man, in contradistinction to regenerate man, or the carnal mind, in opposition to the spiritual mind, or spiritually minded.

Man is constituted with animal propensities in common with the lower animals; and while he acts from their impulses, alone, he is an animal, in every sense of the word, and not anything more than an animal; he is, also, endowed with intellectual faculties, to raise him above brute nature, and to enable him to discover the proprieties of life, and fashion his course after a higher standard; this is intellectual man, without the true ennobling powers; and he is, likewise, blessed above all the rest of creation, with moral sentiments, to prompt him to kindly feelings—to exercise benevolence, to live justly, and to overcome the selfishness of the animal propensities; this constitutes the mere moral man. The proper development and improvement of this compound being, is the great aim of life, namely, to prepare gross earthy man for the reception of spiritual qualifications for eternal existence in a higher and brighter sphere.

The appropriate training of these natural faculties of the human mind may, of themselves, render man just and peaceable, so long as there is not any thing of great moment to war with his feelings and thwart his interests. Yet, notwithstanding the perfection of these natural endowments, they leave man, a natural man, earthy, as the Scriptures style it. Man may be just and kind at one moment, and passionate and perverse at another, so long as he is controlled by natural emotions. To become a perfect man, he must be transformed by renewing grace—by the spirit of the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is the new birth—the beginning of spiritual-life; the life that assimilates man to angelic beings; the life that raises us above the low, groveling, and ever varying impulses of the natural man—the principle that makes man God-like. This is, emphatically, the final purpose of our probation on earth.

This new-life can only be derived from a spiritual source, and that from the one legitimate source, the Spirit of Grace, as revealed in the spiritual dispensation of the New Testament. The old dispensation was adapted to the natural man; and though, mainly, a religious code, yet its principles were only suited to the carnal mind, and it was justly called "the ministration of death." It was throughout founded on the lex talionis—"life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe." Exod. 21: 23–25. It was but the forerunner, the inkling, not the perfection, of the spiritual system—it was, simply, our school-master to qualify us for a spiritual dispensation.

The genuine spiritual life produces a new, regenerate manifestation of our natural endowments. Christianity does not confer new faculties, but subdues the evil propensities of man, and gives all his powers their proper direction, namely, to glorify the Author and Finisher of our faith. Christianity did not confer new faculties on Peter; he was the same impetuous Peter, after his conversion, that he was before, but it gave them the right direction, to serve the living God, save in one instance, when he fell back on the pusillanimity of his own natural corruption. John's affection was not created by Christianity, but it was sublimated, by the Spirit of Grace, to intense devotion to his beloved Master. And Paul, energetic, driving Paul, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, the foremost in maligning and persecuting the disciples of the lowly Jesus, when he was converted to Christianity, had no new faculty of veneration, or conscientiousness, added to his mental conformation, but had them set right, by "the renewing of his mind," and, immediately, he bestowed the same vigorous energies he had formerly displayed, to the furtherance of the Gospel, with like ardor and enthusiasm that he previously persecuted the saints. And so it is with Christianity in the present day. Grace is a superadded principle, to give a new impulse, a new direction, to our natural faculties, now to be moulded and controlled by a sense of redeeming grace; but the great error, in renewed man, is, his not applying himself to the task of appreciating and carrying out the high and ennobling principles of that spiritual economy, with which his heart has been imbued. Man is too content with the smallest modicum of spiritual life; and, therefore, we seldom find any great displays of the true nobility of Christianity—greater conformity, more perfect assimilation to our Exampler—becoming more self-denying, more self-sacrificing, more God-like.

The great distinguishing feature of the two covenants—the covenant of works and the covenant of grace—is, that in the former the injunction, Do this and live, is imperatively demanded, while in the latter we are directed to look unto Jesus, who was made a sin-offering for us—the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth;—while, under the former, every man looked unto his own things, under the latter, we are instructed, "Look not every man on his own things, but every man look, also, on the things of others"—"rejoice with those that do rejoice, and weep with those that weep;"—and while the lex talionis was the ruling principle of the former, charity and forgiveness are the peculiar features of the latter—even to pray for your enemies, and do good unto those who despitefully use you. Christianity, instead of regarding self, is ever instilling nobler impulses, as the correct motive to action, in the hearts of its disciples.

Various are the estimates placed on true nobility in the world. Birth and fortune form infinitely the greater proportion of the so-called noble men and noble women of earth. A hero, a successful military chieftain, who brings his trophies of bloodshed from the battle-field, becomes titled, in most countries, and takes rank with the exclusives in regal companionship, while the truly heroic, in private life, those who devote themselves to the welfare of their race, facilitate the progress of improvement, meliorate the condition of their fellow creatures, wear out their strength and their lives in prolonged researches into the mysteries of science and the evils of society, enter the pest-house to minister to suffering mortals, and give themselves to unceasing toil and sleepless nights, to win blind, infatuated devotees of fashion and folly, to the highest enjoyments of enduring bliss—are condemned to retirement and obscurity, forsooth they labor in their private studies and apart from the walks of the busy multitude. The masses cringe and truckle to the conqueror of armies, and see glory in the gushing blood of his victims trickling from his skirts; while the student, the self-sacrificing student of the mysteries of Nature and Deity, shortens his own days by intense pursuit, to enlighten a world reveling in error and gross darkness, is left to penury and want, although he indefatigably exercises a nobler, nay, ten thousand times a more noble calling than the soldier or the demagogue.

The Patriot, in the common acceptation of the term, is born in or from the recollection of the strife of war and the struggles of a political revolution; and the Soldier is the product of ensanguined controversy; while the Christian Philanthropist is created by the Spirit of Grace, from on high, descending, silently, into the inmost recesses of the soul, and transforming that soul into the image of the Divine Master, by implanting the spirit of righteousness in his heart, as the sole motive to all his future actions. How or by what process that is effected, it is not my purpose, now, to inquire. Whether it be a peculiar adaptation of the mental organization to be influenced, under certain conditions, by the word of truth, and thus conform its powers to the expressed will of God, the Law-giver in Zion; or whether it be an afflatus—a mystic application of the Spirit of Grace, expelling the "old man," and implanting the "new man," by conferring new impulses, and new affinities, in the soul of fallen man; or whether it be the singular and fanciful "concorporation" of the Mercersburg Doctors—the absolute incorporation of an atom of the glorified body of the Lord Jesus in the heart of every penitent, and that infused body become the germ of the resurrection body—I leave for hair-splitting metaphysicians to argue and determine; it must suffice, at present, to say, in the words of the blessed Master: "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but thou canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." Were we disposed to inquire into this matter particularly, it would be quite as easy to imagine the rays of the Sun of Righteousness impinging, indelibly, his image on the heart of man, as the rays of light impinge permanent semblances, absolute prickings of any object, on a polished plate covered with a simple chemical preparation; which is the process of the Daguerrean art. The heart of the natural man is hard, obdurate, resisting, devilish; but that heart of stone, that petrified soul, when rendered plastic by the word of God and penitential tears, may take the impress of the Spirit of Grace, as readily as the metalic surface receives the etchings of the ethereal rays; and in the dottings of Gethsemane and Calvary, thus left on the heart of the sincere inquirer, the crucified Redeemer recognizes his own lineaments, and adopts the penitent into his ransomed family. The Patriot's aspirations are, generally, confined to his own contracted Utica; a Christian belongs to no country, and no nation, exclusively. His wrestlings are for the whole brotherhood of man—his country, the only country that claims his undivided fealty, is the spirit land, and his only Sovereign, the King of kings. The so-called Patriot acts, mostly, from selfish, oft times the most sordid motives; while the Christian is impelled by the ingenuous spirit of universal benevolence, to serve his day and his generation, and glorify his Master in the heavenly Canaan. The inflated demagogue, affecting the true patriot, not unfrequently, inveighs, vehemently and disingenuously, against the Ministers of this holy calling; denouncing them, in vulgar cant, as the priesthood—the "hireling priesthood"—and esteeming them scarcely any more worthy than the Spirit of Darkness, himself, if not the veritable embodiment of his Satanic Majesty. The last office the writer could be induced to undertake, would be to defend any Minister, or Priest, who should so far forget his holy calling, as to enter the political arena, and become the brawling gladiator, for any secular purpose, or use his office to circumvent the ignorant and the unsuspecting, or to introduce political questions into the pulpit, to fan discord and influence the elective franchise; and much less would he countenance any effort to commingle affairs of State and Church together; on the contrary, he would be among the first in the land, to join a crusade of uncompromising hostility to such an unhallowed design, and would be willing to award a decree of condemnation no less than Anathema Maranathema. But all boasting patriots are not impelled by the purest motives; neither do I regard, by any means, that all the ministers of the blessed Gospel sustain the unblemished, unspotted character, becoming their high, their solemn vocation; but as the tree is to be judged by its fruit, let us draw a lesson from the thrasonical Patriot, and contrast it with the ennobling traits of an humble servant of the Cross, as illustrated in a deeply interesting passage of the history of our beloved country, in one of its darkest days—one of its most trying times.

It is an easy matter to be a friend, and a very bold friend, in a good cause, while that cause is popular and it prospers; but it takes a stout heart, and a very stout heart, to embrace a cause under unpropitious circumstances and sore persecutions, and that particularly when its interests and its prospects of success are on the wane, and it is likely to overwhelm its advocates with infamy and obloquy. The contrary course has ever been the tendency and practice of mankind, generally; nay, thousands have ever been found ready to turn their heel against the most holy cause they may have espoused, when dark hours lower and portentous reverses beset them. Every period of the world's history, in every nation on earth, affords numerous and pertinent illustrations of this position; but it was a distinguished characteristic, in the noble struggle of our forefathers for Independence, that few, very few, comparatively, such renegades were found among the sires of the Revolution. Next to Benedict Arnold, we may, perhaps, rank Michael Widmer; not for any corresponding traits of talent or character, but for his perfidy and pusillanimity.

For a short time after the Declaration of Independence was proclaimed, on the ever-memorable Fourth of July, 1776, and the tocsin of Freedom, first pealed from the old State House bell, was echoed and reëchoed throughout the length and breadth of the infant colonies, the whole land became vocal with shouts of Freedom, and the soul-inspiring songs of Liberty and Independence. Then it was easy to be a patriot, when every one was singing hosannas to the American cause.

In severing our allegiance from the mother country, where so many interests lay, and around which so many near and dear ties clustered, it could not be expected, that it be otherwise than almost inevitable, that some, nay, that many, should adhere to the old government and to the royal cause. Such was to be expected; but when the masses responded to the manifesto of that august Congress, it became a popular passion to espouse the cause of Freedom. It was an easy thing, then, I repeat, to be a patriot. There was a poetry and an enthusiasm which carried along the buoyant throng; but when reverses came, when defeat followed defeat, and when impending disasters threatened to annihilate every vestige of successful opposition to Britain—when the brave army was flying before the invaders, when the civil powers were driven from their seats, and grim want and incessant sufferings overtook the noble martyrs in so holy a cause—there, and then, was "the times that tried men's souls." The great wonder is, that, under such disasters, not more proved treacherous to the cause, and by a greater disaffection, ruin the almost expired hope of the American people. All praise to the spirit of the noble martyrs of the Revolution, and that valiant band of patriots who bared their breasts to the storm, and who became braver and stronger as dangers thickened, and, likewise, became the more devoted as their cause flagged. All praise, now and forever, to the noble sires of the war of Independence.

Soon as the news was spread abroad of the colonies having thrown off their allegiance to their Sovereign, the King of Great Britain, the people of almost every county or district organized themselves into Committees of Safety; who undertook to succor the cause of Freedom, and aid in supplying the means to carry on the conflict for Independence. Distinguished among those organizations, was the Committee of Safety, of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania; at whose head was Michael Widmer, a prominent, enterprising citizen, who had been exceedingly zealous in the cause of his country.

Widmer kept a public house at the crossings of the Lancaster and Reading road with the Brandywine and Paxton road, a short distance from Ephrata, the German Seventh-day Baptist settlement. There was no man more active, nor of bolder pretensions, than the same Michael Widmer, while the star of Freedom was in the ascendant; but he proved to be only a fair-weather man—a time serving, truckling dastard—one moved by the lowest impulses of the human heart, the basest cowardice and the basest treachery.

One evening, soon after General Howe had taken possession of the city of Philadelphia, two men, who had come incog. to reconnoitre the Ephrata establishment, to which place the wounded American soldiers were sent by General Washington, after the battle of Brandywine, rode up to Widmer's tavern, and asked for lodgings. While they were seated at their supper, soon provided, they addressed Widmer pleasantly, who was standing with his back to an open window; and after some common-place remarks, Widmer blusteringly inquired, "Whether they knew how that infamous scoundrel General Howe was getting along in Philadelphia."

Flushed, instantly, by the invidious remark, one of the men asked, with some warmth, "What, sir, would you think if you were to see General Howe before you?"

"Think?" he replied, as hastily, "I think I should see as ——— a scoundrel as ever walked."

In an instant the stranger sprang on his feet, and presenting a pistol to Widmer's breast, exclaimed, "You ——— rebel, you are a dead man."

With as great agility, Widmer threw himself out of the window, backwards, and thus saved himself. As the night was dark, he eluded pursuit; and the strangers, fearing a disturbance in the neighborhood from the occurrence, left immediately, and were never seen again in the parts.

Although a tavern-keeper, Widmer was the most prominent man in that part of the county at the time, and always exercised an influence, for weal or for wo, as he bent his inclinations. He lived about midway between Ephrata and the old German Reformed Church of that vicinity; to which church Peter Miller ministered before he embraced the principles of the Seventh-day Baptists, and became a brother in the Monastic Establishment; over which he was soon called to preside, as Prior. Widmer was one of the "Vorstehers" in the German Reformed Church, at the time Miller changed his views of divine truth, and attached himself to the Baptists, and he persecuted him unrelentingly, and to the most shameful extent; even made it his habit to spit in the venerable old man's face, every time and every where he met him, and otherwise abused and maltreated him scandalously.

After Widmer's escape through the window, he first directed his course to the cornfield, then to the rocky margin of the Kochhalekung; but not feeling safe or secure any where, and regarding his days as numbered if detected, he, in his extremity, sought the place where no one would ever suspect him of being concealed, and secreted himself in the Brother's House in Ephrata, of whom he had been such a shameless reviler and persecutor—not only of the Prior, but many of the other brethren. Entering its long narrow passages, which were never barred at night, he made his way quietly to the attic, or rather the upper, unoccupied loft, in the peak of its high roof, and there lay, behind a stack of chimneys, three days and three nights, without food or drink.

Ruminating on his position, his sad predicament, and fearing the worst, he resolved to go to Philadelphia, and endeavor to conciliate General Howe; and finding his way out, again, about midnight on the fourth night, he communicated his purpose to his wife, supplied himself with money and such clothing as he deemed needful, and set out at once for the city.

On his arrival in Philadelphia, he hastened to General Howe's Quarters, and asked admission, on the plea of having important matters to communicate to the commanding officer.

When Widmer was ushered into the presence of General Howe, he became very much embarrassed, and could not give utterance to a single word. To break that unmeaning pause, the General inquired, "With whom am I in communication?" Widmer hesitated, and then said, that "when assured that forgiveness would be granted to one who had embraced the American cause from the onset, and had, in his zeal, been discourteous to the royal cause and its adherents, he would add important information of stores and ammunition concealed for the rebels."

While making this declaration, two officers were thumbing a book of entry or record before them, and before General Howe opened his lips in reply, the officers directed his attention to the page before them. After reading a short paragraph, during which he glanced his eye several times at Widmer, he suddenly exclaimed, "Ah! sir, you are Michael Widmer."

It was like a thunderbolt to him. He fell on his knees, and besought his mercy; and not only begged like a poor culprit, but proffered his services to perform any duty against the Americans.

General Howe's only reply was, "that it was the policy of the British officers to encourage disaffection in the rebel ranks; yet, one who had occupied such a position in the confidence of his countrymen, as he, Widmer, had, and could prove treacherous to them on so slight a pretext—such a cowardly, contemptible pretext, could never be trusted in the Royal cause;" and gave him permission to depart, with orders that he be seen safely beyond the English out-posts.

Widmer had not left his home two days before his wife proclaimed his purpose of dark treachery. Dispatches were sent to all the American stations connected with the immediate detachments, apprizing the officers in command, and the Committees of Safety of the lower counties, of Widmer's design, and all were on the alert to secure him.

On approaching the first out-post of the American lines, he was discovered and arrested. He was carried to the nearest Block House, at the Turk's Head, now West-Chester, where he was carefully kept in durance until a Court Martial was summoned on his case.

The action of the Court was prompt and summary, and he was adjudged to be hung—the penalty for traitors in that day.

Among all who expressed an opinion on his base treachery, among his neighbors, who denounced him without stint, there was but one person who withheld condemnation and denunciation—but one soul that cherished a kindly thought for him; and that was Peter Miller—the much-abused Peter Miller.

Peter Miller, on hearing of his arrest, set out immediately, to the Camp at the Valley Forge; at which place he arrived, just as General Washington had approved and dispatched, by a courier, the finding of the Court Martial. Miller, being intimately acquainted with General Lee, who had visited him frequently, at Ephrata, as a Scholar,* was presented to the Commander-in-Chief immediately. Washington received him graciously, for he had heard much of him favorably, as connected with the Ephrata Monastic Establishment, during the war of 1756—the French war, as it was denominated—and had the highest testimonials of him in advance of this interview, from all the Officers and Surgeons in attendance on the wounded at the Cloister.

Washington requested him to be seated; but Miller replied, that his business with him would not admit of a moment's delay—that it required immediate dispatch; and instantly proceeded to plead for mercy towards Widmer, most forcibly, most eloquently.

It was a majestic tableau to look upon the American Commander-in-Chief, General Lee, and several other staff-officers, and Peter Miller, in his monastic wardrobe standing in front, forming a most imposing group. Peter Miller was a tall man, of much grace, clad in a long grey tunic or toga, secured by a simple belt around his waist, while the cowl thrown back exposed his exuberant snowy hair and strong white beard, flowing in graceful waves over his shoulders, and covering his whole chest in front, while his expressive face, strongly marked with intelligence and benignity, was animated by the warmest benevolence, as he sued for the life of a fellow being. All were absorbed in listening to the burning words falling from the Prior's lips, which subdued the military idea of retaliation almost entirely, in every breast, and all began to regard the Commander-in-Chief as disposed to exercise his prerogative of mercy; but, rallying himself to the responsibility of his station, he replied: "Friend Miller, there is scarcely any thing in this world, that I would deny to you, but such is the state of public affairs, that it would be fatal to our cause, not to be stringent, inexorable, in such matters, and make examples of renegades to the cause of Liberty; otherwise I should most cheerfully release your friend"——

"Friend!" exclaimed Miller, interrupting General Washington, and at the same time throwing up both his hands, as if in attestation to the Searcher of Hearts—"he is my worst enemy—my incessant reviler. For a friend I might not importune you; but Widmer being, and having been, for years, my worst, my malignant, persecuting enemy, my religion teaches me "to pray for those who despitefully use me"——

The tears coursed down the brave old Commander's cheeks, and taking Miller by the hand, he replied: "My dear friend, I thank you for this lesson of Christian charity. I cannot resist such a manifestation of our divine religion; the pardon shall be granted on one condition, and that is, you be the bearer of it yourself, and hand it to the Commanding Officer at Turk's Head, in Widmer's presence."

Miller assented to the condition. The pardon was prepared with the least possible delay, and handed to the Prior, who sat out immediately, and reached the Turk's Head on foot, late that night, a distance of eighteen or twenty miles.

Rising early next morning, after a sleepless night, he found the front of the Block House surrounded by a few soldiers drawn up in a hollow square, having a gibbet in the center, and Widmer standing on the step, with a rope adjusted around his neck, addressing those present. He acknowledged his treachery, and acquiesced in the award; warned them to faithfulness and steadfastness to the cause of Liberty; and just as he was beseeching mercy from above, Miller stepped forward and handed to the Commanding Officer a package, stating in an undertone, that it was from the Commander-in-Chief, in reference to the matter before them. While the Commander of the post was perusing the document, Widmer espied Peter Miller. He blushed, and became greatly agitated, not knowing any thing of the design of the Prior's visit, and could only assign his presence to the gratification it would afford him to see so vile and abusive a persecutor receive his just deserts. There stood the inflated demagogue, the thrasonical patriot, the craven coward, overwhelmed with shame, awaiting an ignominious death; and there stood the humble disciple of the Cross, on an errand of mercy to his enemy, not vaunting himself, but supported by the soul-sustaining principles of his holy calling. The contrast to Widmer was galling in the extreme, but, summoning up courage, he addressed Miller from where he stood: "Peter Miller, whatever has prompted your presence at this place, at this time, I avail myself of the occasion to acknowledge my great and multiplied abuse and persecution, with which I have followed you for years past; and esteem it the kindest providence, that I have the opportunity to retract my numerous villifications and outrages upon you, and crave your forgiveness. My unmitigated persecution of you was beyond measure, and although I have no right to look for forgiveness for such wanton maltreatment, yet I trust that I may find pardon above"——

The Commanding Officer interrupted Widmer at this point, by announcing to him, that the Commander-in-Chief had granted a pardon for his crime; and presenting Peter Miller, added, "Here is your deliverer."

The bold, blustering detractor was dumfounded—he could not utter a word, but cast himself, prostrate, on the ground at Miller's feet. It wanted no words—all witnessed, all felt, all acknowledged, this extraordinary manifestation of the nobility of Christianity. It could not be uttered. It was not an earthly but a celestial emotion, and earth's vocabulary possesses no language to define or portray it. The nobility of Christianity is only seen in transient glimpses on earth; its perfect fruition, to which we may approximate in some measure on earth, can only be fully comprehended and appreciated in heaven.

CARRY YOUR LETTERS.

My heart has been pained, (says a missionary in Wisconsin,) to find so many backsliding professors of religion, who had laid down all forms of religion; and I would here recommend to all coming West to take letters and bring them along with them, and present them at the first opportunity. But, even if they do not thus present them, they may serve as faithful monitors, as was true in one case among us. In a meeting, one night, of deep solemnity, a man rose and said, "It is a wonder to me that I am out of hell!" and then went on to relate, that nine years before he had taken a letter from a church East, and brought it into this country, and instead of presenting it to the church, he laid it away at the bottom of his chest. He said that every time he had seen it there it had troubled him so much that once he had resolved to burn it; but its silent reproofs prevented his committing that outrage upon his faithful monitor. He then confessed his sins humbly before the people, knelt down in the midst of the congregation, and in an humble prayer of penitence confessed his sins before God, and asked his forgiveness. I thought, Oh that our pastors and churches at the East would see to it that all their members that go out from them take letters along with them! This man's wife is among the converts, and joined the church with him, and presented their only child to God in baptism, and so they have vowed to train it for God.

Let every pastor who reads this ask himself whether any of his own people have emigrated to the new States, and are living without church connections there; and whether he has not a duty to discharge in the premises.

THE COPENHAGEN WATCHMEN.

The following is a spirited and characteristic translation, by Mr. Ellis, of the ancient song of the Copenhagen watchmen, which still keeps its place as a part of the manners and customs of that town. Its author was Thomas Kingo, Bishop of Fyen, in the seventeenth century, son of a poor damask weaver. Thomas Kingo, we are informed, was the best of Danish psalmists, and a psalm-book of his composition still remains authorized and in use at Christiania in Norway.

EIGHT O'CLOCK.

When Day departs, and Darkness reigns on earth,
The scene reminds us of the gloomy grave!
Then let Thy light, O Lord, before us shine,
While to the silent tomb our steps we bend,
And grant a blessed Immortality!

NINE O'CLOCK.

The Day glides by, and sable Night appears—
For Jesus' sake, O God, our sins forgive!
Preserve the Royal Family,
And guard the people which this land contains
From danger of the Enemy!

TEN O'CLOCK.

Master, maid, and boy, would you the hour know?
It is the time that you to rest should go—
Trust in the Lord with faith—and careful be
Of fire and light; for Ten o'clock has struck!

ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

Almighty God protects both great and small;
His holy angels guard us like a wall;
The Lord Himself our city watches o'er,
And keeps our bodies and our souls from harm.

TWELVE O'CLOCK.

At th' hour of midnight was our Saviour born—
Great blessing to a world which else were lost!
Then, with unfeigned lips, in prayer and praise,
Commend yourselves to God. Past Twelve o'clock.

ONE O'CLOCK.

O Jesus Christ, we pray Thee send us help
To bear our Cross with patience in the world,
For thou art God alone!
And Thou, O Comforter, Thine hand stretch forth;
Then will the burthen light and easy be!
The clock has stricken One!

TWO O'CLOCK.

O gracious Lord, whose love for us was such
That Thou should'st deign in darkness to be born;
All glory 's due to Thee!
Come, Holy Ghost, and pour into our hearts
Thy heav'nly light, that we may see Thee now,
And in Eternity!

THREE O'CLOCK.

Black Night departs, and Day begins to dawn—
Keep them far off, O God, who wish us harm!
The clock has stricken Three!
Father, Thine aid we seek!—and of Thy Grace
Give us abundantly!

FOUR O'CLOCK.

Eternal God! who would'st the Keeper be
Of us who dwell below—
To Thee, surrounded by the Heavenly Host,
Honor and praise are due!
For this good night give thanks unto the Lord!
Remember "Four!"—we're summoned from our guard.

FIVE O'CLOCK.

Jesu, Thou Morning Star! we now resign
To Thy protection, cheerfully, our King;
Be Thou his Sun and Shield!
And thou, bright Orb of Day, begin thy course,
And, rising from the Mercy-seat of God,
Thy radiant lustre yield!

WATCH FOR SOULS.

When acting as pastor for the Baptist church in Lowell, Ohio, one Saturday, as I returned home from chuch meeting, a man, of whom I had a little knowledge, and but little, stood at the gate of my next neighbor. I observed he regarded me with interest, as though wishing to speak to me. I stopped accordingly, and engaged in conversation with him. It was on general topics, although I thought at the time he probably wished to converse on the subject of religion. A feeling of delicacy and difficulty hindered; perhaps I should say, "but Satan hindered;" for, the truth was, in addition to never being very skillful in the pastoral office, I was then afraid of its running me into pecuniary difficulties, having never received any aid from the church I served. I was led to see, the more converts or Christian friends, the more waste of time, if I served faithfully. But so it was; the occasion passed, as also did the Sabbath; and although he attended preaching, the gray-headed, pleasant-countenanced man returned home, and no talk about religion.

Not long after, I was called to attend his funeral; he had died suddenly—his own family not looking for it. I found his humble dwelling standing remote from the thoroughfares of men, and along with abundant marks of industry and taste, were seen the evidences of poverty and trouble that had brought him to that location. And within doors, the heart-rending grief of one or two little girls, as they patted the cold cheeks of their dead father, and tried to embrace him in his coffin, and the silent anguish of his wife, told plainly enough how high he had stood in their affections, and how great their present loss.

After a month or two, the widow came out again, and I happened in her company. The conversation turned on her recent loss. She told me of her husband's troubles, and how he said to her, shortly before his death, that he expected to live but a short time. "And O!" continued she, "how the poor soul wanted to be baptized. Do you remember, sir, when he came down to your meeting last, and met you at Mr. ———'s gate?" "Yes." "Well, he came down on purpose, and stood there at the gate to talk with you about it, when you came along. But he couldn't get the matter introduced, somehow, and it was not done. But it would have been such a consolation to him, and to the rest of us, now he is gone. I always shall be sorry you didn't know what he wanted."

This fell like a millstone on my feelings. I thought of the apostolic injunction—"Watch for souls, as they that must give account." I promised myself to reform, but fear I have never done it.

A USEFUL SERMON.—The Presbyterian says that the discourse by Rev. George Potts, D. D., of New York, preached in behalf of the American Sunday-School Union, seems destined to a large circulation. The Union have published 25,000 copies of it. The necessity of developing and employing the latent talent of Church members is the subject of it, and a more important one to the efficiency of the Church could scarcely have been selected.

It is said that all the weeping willow trees in England originated from a twig planted by Pope. He received a present of figs from Turkey, and observing a twig in the basket, he set it in his garden, where it became a fine tree.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, November 24, 1853.

Proclamation,

By HORATIO SEYMOUR, Governor of the State of N. Y.

I hereby appoint THURSDAY, the twenty-fourth inst., as a day of THANKSGIVING for the people of the State of New York. I recommend its suitable observance by such religious assemblages and forms of worship as our citizens may severally deem appropriate; so that we may as a commonwealth, with united hearts, humbly and gratefully render thanks to our Father in Heaven for His benefits, and earnestly implore the continuance of His favor.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the privy seal of the State, [L. S.] at the City of Albany, this 5th day of November, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three.

By the Governor, HORATIO SEYMOUR.

MIXED MARRIAGES AND FAMILY GOVERNMENT—AGAIN.

The keeping of two days instead of one is not the only difficulty which springs from the intermarriage of Sabbatarians with Sunday-keepers. In the rearing of children develops trials, in comparison with which the burden of keeping two days is nothing. One of the first duties which a pious mother urges upon her offspring is to keep holy the Sabbath day. She feels that she can scarcely begin too early. She watches the dawnings of intellect with fond anxiety, and every hour tries some new experiment to prove the child's capability of discerning between good and evil. She finds that her little one is very early made sensible of the difference between one day and another; and by training him to lay aside his plays and toys on the Sabbath, and solemnly telling him that it is God's holy day, she leads him into the knowledge of that Being, whose work of goodness and power the Sabbath commemorates. Thus, while the child is yet so young that he can scarcely lisp the words of the Commandment, he becomes by means of the Sabbath instructed in the first elements of piety.

Can the conscientious, God-fearing mother, omit to press this duty upon her dear child? Must she be bound up, and restrained from saying any thing on the subject? Must she refrain from urging a duty which, in connection with that of honoring parents, is the point at which religious instruction properly begins with infant minds? For, be it remembered, that the duties of the Fourth and Fifth Commandments are almost the only ones which very young minds can be made readily to comprehend. It would be somewhat difficult to convince a child two years old the sin of worshiping graven images, or of profaning one's name. But it is easy to say to him, "This is the Lord's day; you must not play to-day; you must lay aside all your toys, and behave with quietness till the sun is down." It is easy thus to make him understand, that the Sabbath is different from all other days of the week. And having made him understand this, the mother has made a fair beginning towards teaching him, that the God who claims the day as his own is his Creator, whom he ought to love and obey. It might be somewhat difficult to make a child so young understand the sin of adultery, or of theft, or of covetousness; for the relations affected by such things are not yet clear to him. But the relation in which his parents stand towards him is known before any other; it is the first of which he becomes sensible. Hence it appears to be the design of Infinite Wisdom, that all religious instruction should commence with these two Commandments, and that from them, as the natural starting points, the infant mind should be led along into the clear knowledge of every other duty of the Divine Law. Parents who do not begin the religious instruction of their children in this way, go to work wrong end foremost, and the consequence in nine cases out of ten is, that their children become "abominable, and disobedient, and to every good work reprobate."

But what is to be done? Must the Seventh-day Baptist mother seal her lips on this most important subject? Must she withhold from her child, whom God requires to be trained in the way of his commandments, almost the only religious instruction which his infant mind can receive? May she omit that very kind of instruction, which would give a decided impression to her child's moral character, and perhaps shape his destiny for eternity? Nevertheless, she has bound herself hand and foot. She has come under subjection to a husband who will not allow his children to be taught that the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord. He believes that the first day of the week is holy time, and thanks the Lord every Sunday morning, for the return of another day of rest. Whatever is taught the children, must be in accordance with his faith; and if the wife cannot conscientiously teach thus, she must hold her tongue. He has a conscience, as well as she; and though it may be a perverted one, it is nevertheless his conscience, and its promptings he cannot disregard, without feeling that he risks his soul's salvation. He obeys his conscience, and has his children taught that Sunday is the Lord's day. It is folly for the wife to set up her conscience in opposition to her husband's. She should have thought of that before; it is now too late. She must withhold her instructions; she has no alternative.

Well, the family increases; the children are multiplied; sons and daughters make up the group. The work of each week goes on, and on sixth-day the mother hurries, that, by the going down of the sun, she may be free from care. But the father acts differently, and on the seventh-day drives his employment as usual. The children remark the strange difference, and wonder that father and mother cannot agree in their practice. The effect on them is disastrous. The mother's silent example proves insufficient to counteract an influence which is backed by the father's authority and all the world beside. It is easy for the children to follow that example which has the sanction of popular favor; and so, as they grow up, they go as the father goes. They go to church with the father, not with the mother. She, poor thing, goes alone, sits alone, returns alone, and returns to find her house a scene of turmoil and hurry. The children go to church with their father, not because they honestly believe that he is right, but because it is more agreeable to do so. The throng is there; the popular preacher is there; the large choir is there; their young companions are there; the excitements which the young mind loves are there. They join the assembly in singing

> "This is the day the Lord hath made,
> "He calls the hours his own;"

and say Amen, as their father does, when the minister says, "We thank thee, O Lord, for another of the days of the Son of Man!" The mother witnesses it all, mourns that the truth is set at nought in her own family, but hopes, (O how anxiously does a mother hope for her children's welfare!) that as they are not willing to keep the true Sabbath, they will, nevertheless, become good Christians of the first-day order.

It is well if the result is no worse. It would be well if the children were to become as pious even as the father. But, in the majority of cases, they learn to despise religion. How could it well be otherwise? If the Sabbath, that institution by which the infant mind is first impressed with the sacredness of divine things, is not to be employed for any such purpose, except so far as the father may choose—if the mother is to be restrained from making any use of it as a means of leading her children to God—if during all the time that they are under her molding hand, and gentle but powerful sway, it is never once to be named to them; what wonder is it if, in the mean time, their corrupt nature should gain such an advantage, that all other religious culture should prove as water spilt upon the ground? As they grow up, they keep no day of rest. They do not keep the Bible Sabbath, because they have never been allowed to do so. They do not keep the Sunday, because they have become old enough to discover the cheat by which it was attempted to impose it upon them as a divine institution. They now act for themselves, and they have no Sabbath at all. Sometimes they are found paying a sort of outward respect to the seventh day of the week, and sometimes to the first; flitting from one to the other, back and forth, as considerations of profit or popularity dictate.

It may be counted a hard thing that the mother, who travails in pains most agonizing to bring her children into the world—who gives them nourishment from her own body—who nurses them by night and by day—who toils for them, cares for them in sickness, weeps when they are in trouble, and sings when they are glad—who will take the food from her own mouth that they may be fed, and the raiment from her own back that they may be clothed—should, nevertheless, be prohibited from inculcating her own religious faith upon their minds. We admit it; it is hard. But if mother and father cannot agree in this business, one or the other must yield. There can be no government, where there is not some authority that is supreme. If God has given this authority to the father, there let it remain; and let our Seventh-day Baptist sisters look sharply, and pray earnestly, before they place themselves in such a situation.

THE MAINE LAW.

The State of New York is now to have the Maine Law. The election of a fair majority, of both branches of the Legislature on this issue, shows that public sentiment has already decided in its favor. This result has been secured by long-continued, well directed, effort. A still greater effort is to be made, to execute such a law, when it shall be the law of the land. Heretofore the effort has been one of argument—of persuasion. Henceforth it is to combine legal action, and physical force, with moral suasion, and for the simple reason, that personal interests, and incurable ignorance, can not be convinced by argument. Rumsellers have been deaf to the cry of wretchedness caused by their traffic. The poverty of a drunkard's home—the wretchedness of his family—the misery, starvation, and disgrace, entailed upon his victims—have failed to unseal the feelings of his heart. Cold, relentless, unmoved, he has gathered up the price of suffering, disgrace, orphanage, and widowhood, and laid it in his coffers.

The people have decided that the day of oppression, of wretchedness, and ruin, caused by intemperance, shall now pass away. The great destroyer of peace, of social happiness—the blighter of hopes, and ruiner of souls—is himself to be destroyed. But how changed will be the scene! The passage of the Maine Law will inspire the first beatings of hope and happiness in hearts that have been crushed in hopeless despair. The joy flashing from countenances heretofore cast down will brighten many a home of wretchedness. The rags of poverty will be cast away, when wives and children are allowed the use of their own hard earnings. And then shall thousands of the enslaved assert and maintain their freedom, when the tempter is chained. Amid all the joy, and hope, and freedom, that will dance on many a countenance in the new Millennium of the Maine Law, there will appear the very pitiful, ludicrous, woe-begone face of the rumseller, asking sympathy. Ah! he who has never given signs of possessing a human heart, and commiserating human suffering, will appear as tender and meek as a lamb. He who has never heeded the prayer of poverty and wretchedness, will offer the most melting prayer, when a righteous law shall compel him to stop his business of destruction. Because of this prayer, and the cry "it will ruin me," "it is unjust to stop my business and destroy my property," thousands will become faint-hearted and irresolute. And now, when the shout of victory cleaves the air, and reëchoes, as it is taken up and repeated by thousands who hail it as their only hope, there will be found a multitude of impracticables, who will be afraid of the consequences of enforcing the law. The drunkard has in it the hope of redemption, and will gladly hail it. The tax-payer will find in it a diminution of his taxes. By it jails will become tenantless, crime will diminish, and litigation grow less. None can suffer by it, except those who have made a trade of making others suffer. Let none be faint-hearted. The strife to enforce the law may be a severe one; but on the part of the law it is a strife for right, for humanity, for truth. And shall a man's courage fail him when he is advocating the cause of the oppressed and afflicted? Never before has so glorious a triumph, with such promise of complete and permanent success, been secured. Every philanthropist must hail it with sincere delight, and labor on till he sees in its enforcement the consummation of all for which he has labored, and prayed, and hoped.

There is one spot among us as a people where licensed liquor-selling has never been known. Happy spot that, where the destroyer has not invaded the domestic circles, and claimed as its victims, its hope and pride. The enforcement of a prohibitory law may yet change other societies and homes, and make them as happy as those that have never been desolated. Now is the time for each man, woman and child to petition for the enactment of the Maine Law. When it is passed, let each man feel that he is bound, by all the sacred obligations of humanity and religion, to see it enforced.

PALESTINE MISSION.

Christianity dispenses physical as well as spiritual good to mankind.

Man in an unregenerate state realizes the existence and effects of sin first as it relates to his physical being and destiny. To dry up the source of human ills, and to alleviate its sufferings, he naturally anticipates, will be the first feature in the developments of a divine scheme of salvation. Nor is it possible for him easily to divert his attention from this view of the subject. He rationally supposes, that if the greater blessings of salvation are freely offered, and may be obtained with the certainty of a divine promise, that the lesser, or physical benefits, will be secured as a matter of course. These natural impressions seen to have been fully appreciated by the Son of God, in opening and establishing his mission of mercy on earth. Hence his life and labors were characterized with the lovely feature of blessing the bodies as well as souls of men. He often appealed to those humane and benevolent acts and offices, which he performed in such rich abundance, and to which his life was chiefly devoted, as furnishing the most conclusive evidence which the unregenerate and unenlighted mind is capable of appreciating, that he "came down from heaven," and that he was "working the works of God." Man's moral condition is now as hopeless, his power of perception as faint, and his will as strongly developed in opposition to religion, as when Jesus Christ lived and labored on earth. Hence the same mode of approaching and penetrating his darkness, removing his prejudices, and winning his heart to the gospel, which was adopted by its divine Author, should be relied upon by his church. If in introducing his message of love, and to prove his own divinity, the Saviour of men called attention to the fact, that under his benevolent labors, "the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them," the fact that the church in the same spirit is devoting her energies to the same blessed object, must furnish to the world the most unmistakable testimony that she is fulfilling a divine commission. In proportion as she has developed this feature of benevolence, in that ratio has she invited and arrested the wandering spirit of unregenerate man, which in its restless rovings after the means of satisfying its immortal longings, too often hews to itself "broken cisterns, which can hold no water."

When, by the gushing heart of Christian kindness, the hand of sympathy is put forth to wipe the tear of anguish, and to administer to hunger, thirst, and destitution, then it is that the icy regions of the soul are warmed into gratitude, and an avenue is opened to the heart, by which may be introduced the bread and water of eternal life. By opening the ears of the deaf, and the eyes of the blind, the Saviour found a communication to the heart, through which the saving benefits of his salvation were dispensed.

Nor did he fail to impress the importance of this primary branch of Christian effort upon the consideration of his disciples. His allusion to the deed of benevolence and mercy performed by the "good Samaritan," is of such a nature as to make every Christian feel that it is not only deeply interesting as an incident in the history of true benevolence, but that it is designed as a model by which he is to be guided in his efforts to bless the world. It commends the humanity of this member of a proscribed and depised sect, as possessing an essential element of "pure religion and undefiled." Our Lord presents this subject in its most impressive aspect, and exhibits its thrilling importance, by carrying our minds forward to the scenes of the final judgment, when deeds of humanity done "to the least of these his brethren," although long forgotten by the doer, are called to remembrance by the Judge, and accounted as done to himself, while those who had not found a duty and pleasure in ministering to the hungry, the thirsty, the stranger, the naked, the sick and imprisoned, had failed to imbibe the first principles of Christianity, and should be sentenced as guilty of neglecting the Son of God in the persons of his poor and suffering brethren.

This is the work which we propose to enter upon in behalf of the dispersed and despised of the Holy Land. On a soil rich and productive, in a climate both balmy and healthful, amidst associations the most sacred and inspiring, we find in circumstances of abject ignorance, poverty and oppression, the devoted representative of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The description given by Hanani and his brethren, to the pious and patriotic Nehemiah, is literally true of the present Jewish inhabitants of the land of Zion. "They are in great affliction and reproach." With the Jew we find also the Turk and Arab, alike needing the knowledge of the useful arts, and perishing for the want of salvation.

We are told by those who have labored on that field, and whose hearts and hands are devoted to the work of blessing the afflicted son's of Zion, that our religious faith and practice give us an influence, with the Jew especially, which no other body of Christians can command. As lovers of Jehovah's holy day, they look with suspicion upon every effort put forth in their behalf by those who disregard its divine claims. It is only of late that they have learned, through the self-denying efforts of a few American Sabbath-keeping Christians, that the long-neglected soil of their own beloved land will produce in abundance the most nutritious products of our own land. Towards Sabbath-keepers they are beginning to look with imploring interest. Through them they have seen an exhibition of that very interesting element of Christianity which forbids the church to treat with pious mockery "a brother or sister who is naked and destitute of daily food," by saying unto him "depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled, notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body." This truly philosophical as well as Christian plan of providing food and clothing for the hungry and destitute, and industrial employments for the poor Jews and Arabs, has already done much to remove their long-settled prejudices against Christianity, and to create their increasing desire to become acquainted with a religion which they are convinced, from its practical operation, must be far superior to their own. I rejoice that God has directed the eyes and sympathies of the denomination, and the attention of our Missionary Board, to this most interesting field.

The genius of Christianity—the favorable laws by which Palestine is governed, so far as they relate to religious toleration—the wants and claims of that deeply-afflicted portion of our fellow-men—and every indication in God's providence, invites us to enter and occupy it. Let us not forget that it is our duty to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem," that prosperity may again visit her ancient palaces, remembering that "they shall prosper that love her." While, therefore, we give of our money, and of such other useful articles as may be needed for the outfit of those whom we have chosen to labor in that land, let us continually offer our devout intercessions, that they through whose unbelief and rejection of the Messiah we have obtained mercy, may also obtain mercy through our mercy.

WESTERLY, R. I., Nov. 18, 1853.

SABBATH LECTURES—NO. 2.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In a former article, I offered a few thoughts on Sabbath Lectures, showing that the objections which are made against them lie equally against the preaching of the gospel, and any other object of reform. I therefore deem such lectures perfectly consistent with a courteous and Christian manner of presenting truth, and in fact demanded by the present state of the sabbatic question. And I enter my solemn protest against that unmerited opprobrium, which aims at the champions of truth, the defenders of God's law, the sobriquet of bull-dog fighter, disputer, &c. For, be it known, that Jesus and Paul disputed every inch of ground they gained. And let all know, that the Captain of our salvation has declared, that it is only the violent that can storm his castle and enter the kingdom of heaven.

Such being my views, I cheerfully coöperated with Bro. Crandall, as an Agent of the Am. Sabbath Tract Society. In order, therefore to aid him in his agency, I requested him to lecture on the subject of the Sabbath at Sackett's Harbor, in the Methodist meeting-house, which was procured for the purpose. On the appointed evening, a very respectable audience was convened. There was present, also, the Presbyterian clergyman, Rev. Mr. Sawyer, and the Methodist, Rev. Mr. Foote. Bro. Crandall aimed in that lecture to show the perpetuity of the law of God, and that the Sabbath, as a part of that law, was of perpetual obligation. In this position he showed he was sustained by Watson and Dwight, both theological writers of high repute, and observers of the first day. He also quoted largely from history, to show that the church for many centuries observed the true Sabbath of the Lord. At the close of the lecture, opportunity was given to any one to speak; but as no one accepted the invitation, the meeting was closed.

Just before retiring, I was introduced to the Rev. Mr. Sawyer, who requested the privilege of giving his views to our people in Hounsfield on some Sabbath day, adding, that he thought he could convince them of their error. To his proposition I acceded, and appointed the next Sabbath, at 11 o'clock, the usual time of service.

On the Sabbath a large congregation was convened, in which were a goodly number of ministers, whose names, as near as I can recollect, are as follows: Sawyer, Foote, Lyons, Burchard, of the first-day order; Crandall, Summerbell, J. Greene, W. Greene, Griswold. Eld. Campbell, who was expecting to have been present, was prevented by the disappointment of his substitute to preach for him. The services were opened by reading the 17th of John, prayer, and the singing of the good old Sabbatarian hymn, "Another six days work is done." Mr. Sawyer introduced his subject by appropriate remarks upon his text, which was John 16: 13—"Howbeit, when He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth." From this text Mr. Sawyer inferred that the people of God would be guided into truth, although he admitted that they might err, even with this guide. The impression which he evidently designed to make was, that although no precept for first-day observance might be found, yet to such observance Christians might be directed by the Spirit. The speaker then proceeded to his argument, or proof, for the observance of the first day of the week as the Christian Sabbath. It should be premised, that he admitted the seventh day of the week to be the Sabbath given to Adam, the world, and the Jewish nation—that the Sabbath was incorporated in the fourth command—that it was the day in use as the Sabbath in the days of Christ.

The speaker's first argument was based upon Ezekiel 43: 27—"And when these days are expired, it shall be, that upon the eighth day, and so forward, the priests shall make your burnt-offerings upon the altar." Mr. Sawyer maintained that by the eighth day was intimated the change from the seventh to the first day. He thought there was also some intimation of the same change in Psalms—"This is the day the Lord hath made"—although on the last text he would not lay much weight. But upon the former he seemed to have no doubt.

He proceeded to sustain the change from the resurrection, and from the frequent appearances of Christ on the first day, maintaining that Christ never made his appearance to his disciples except on the first day. Acts 20: 7, 1 Cor. 16: 1, Rev. 1: 10, were also brought forward to sustain his position.

He then entered history, which he said fully corroborated his views, by showing that the early Christians all kept the first day, and that Constantine found its observance universal. The speaker thought that history had been interpolated, and otherwise altered, to suit the purpose of Sabbatarians and the Catholic Church, but that true history favored 'first-day observance, as well as teaching good Presbyterianism.

Having thus run through his argument in favor of a change from the seventh to the first, the speaker then expressed his most decided conviction, that Jesus Christ had given a precept for the keeping of the first day, but that such precept was not recorded. He then assumed, that the now first day of the week was the original seventh day, so that, in point of fact, he was keeping the true seventh day as the Sabbath. For proof of this assumption, he showed that at the exodus of Israel the Sabbath was put back one day, also, when Joshua bade the sun stand still one day, that would carry the Sabbath forward one day, so that now the first day was the true seventh day.

It seemed strange to me, that the speaker could not see, that according to his own showing of the receding and advancing of the days of the week, he had only restored by Joshua's dual day, what had fallen back at the exodus of Israel; but he was so set on making out Sunday to be the Sabbath, that even his mathematical demonstration was falsified.

Such was, in substance, the lecture as given by Rev. Mr. Sawyer. It is but just to say, that throughout, the discourse was characterized by chasteness of diction, and the speaker by the courtesy of a Christian minister; and although all were not convinced of the truth of his position, yet all were highly pleased by the good feeling which pervaded both the speaker and the congregation.

On First-day evening, a large assembly came together at the same place to hear a review of the discourse of Mr. Sawyer, by Eld. Crandall. After prayer and singing, Mr. Crandall commenced by passing some criticisms upon the introductory of Mr. Sawyer, particularly referring to a remark of Mr. Sawyer, that his object in dicussion was not victory, but truth. Mr. Crandall thought such remarks uncalled for, as they seemed to intimate that some argued for victory, not truth, which he (Crandall) did not believe was the case generally. He then proceeded to examine Mr. Sawyer's argument, drawn from Ezekiel 43: 27. He showed that there was nothing in it having a bearing on the question under consideration, and the reason why he (Crandall) noticed it so long, was because there was nothing in it.

Mr. Crandall then reëxamined the various texts mentioned by Mr. Sawyer in the New Testament, and showed that there was no account of Christ meeting with his disciples for worship on the first day of the week, after his resurrection, nor of the Apostles doing so.

He showed from Tyndal's translation of the New Testament, that Acts 20: 7, also 1 Cor. 16: 1, 2, referred to the seventh day instead of the first, and that Tyndal had rendered each of those passages Sabbath-day. As Mr. Sawyer had endeavored to detract from the authority of Tyndal's translation, by saying that Tyndal did not fully understand the true idiom of the Greek, which had led him to render Acts 20: 7 and 1 Cor. 16: 2 Sabbath instead of first day, but that more modern acquaintance with the Greek had decided those phrases to mean the first instead of the seventh day. Mr. Crandall most ably defended that ancient martyr and learned translator from the ignorance which Mr. S. charged him with, and showed pretty clearly that suspicion rested on translators who had followed Tyndal as having made a translation to conform to their Sunday observance.

Mr. Crandall also showed, that there had been, and were still, many mutilations of history upon this subject—that the American Tract Society had suppressed certain passages in Buchanan's Researches in Asia, also in Dr. Neander's church history—that fraud had been practiced in order to suppress evidence in favor of the true Sabbath. He then read from Peter Heylin's History of the Sabbath, extracts from Ignatius and others, contrasting them with those given by Mr. Sawyer, which showed that those ancient Sabbath-keepers had been made to give testimony in favor of first-day keeping as the Sabbath, when the fact was that they gave positive evidence in favor of the seventh day.

Mr. Crandall completely demolished the ingenious but sophistical fabric which Mr. Sawyer erected the day before in favor of Sunday-keeping, and it vanished like the baseless fabric of a vision, leaving not a wreck behind. It was indeed a masterly discourse, and did honor even to Mr. Crandall himself. It was calm, dignified, unanswerable. Lectures such as the above, are not noisy arguments, but counterparts of the kind delivered by Jesus and his Apostles. In the above I have only given the sketch from memory, not having taken any notes at the time.

NOTES OF A CORRESPONDENT.

Notes of a Journey West, continued from Recorder of Oct. 27th.

We are free to acknowledge our love and admiration of the West; it is a great and beautiful country. There is encouragement there for the poor man as well as for the rich. Labor is every where necessary to a living; but the same amount of toil expended upon the soil in the East, would, if laid out in the West, produce much more, and then, the poor can do as well, yea, under ordinary circumstances, better in that country than in this; at least, so it seems to us.

There is much of the best quality of land to be bought in and around our churches in Wisconsin. Milton, Albion, and Christiana, are upon the route leading from Milwaukee to Madison, the capital of the State, with the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad running directly or nearly through the centre of the towns. Said a brother to us, "Here is a Seventh-day Baptist street, at least twenty-two miles long, the farms adjacent being owned principally by our people." A score more of families settling here would make it emphatically a Sabbatarian community.

Big Foot Prairie, nine miles long by four or five broad, offers excellent advantages to new comers; not that land there is so very cheap, but that it can be purchased at moderate prices, and will not fail of rewarding the husbandman as well as any other section of the State. Brethren desirous of a home in the West should look well to the claims of these several localities, and perhaps we ought to add, (though we have not seen them,) those of Berlin and Dakota, situated, if our memory serves us right, about one hundred miles north of Milton.

Very early in the morning of Sept. 26th, through the kind aid of Bro. Ephriam B. Swinney, six of us were taken from Walworth to Marengo in Illinois, a distance of twenty-two miles. Here we parted with a relative who had journeyed with us from Akron, N. Y., seeking a Western home, near meeting, and where he might effectually aid the cause. For seven or eight years he with his family had kept Sabbath in Upper Canada; for twenty years he has been connected with the church in Clarence. He is the first Sabbatarian we ever conversed with on the Sabbath question. His quiet persuasive manner, accompanied with a few plain questions, put two of us first-day ministers to our wits to answer; indeed, we could not answer satisfactorily to ourselves, but privately resolved to investigate the subject at a more convenient season. This was six years ago. Since then a change has come over us. The one whom we had been taught to regard as having imbibed strange, if not unscriptural notions of the Sabbath, we now look upon as doing the will of God.

Our friend, in company with others, left M. homeward bound, via Chicago. Arrived at Freeport, sixty or sixty-five miles west of Marengo, and the then terminus of the Galena and Chicago Union Railroad, we at 3 P. M. got into a crowded stage for Savannah, 36 miles southwest of Freeport. Our course by railroad was mostly through prairie land, a good portion of which is yet uncultivated. For twenty miles our route by stage was over wild undulating prairie, with only here and there a house, but wherever a field of corn was to be seen, there was indisputable proof of an exceedingly rich soil. At 1 o'clock A. M., instead of 10 P. M., as was promised us, we reached Savannah, and found, to our surprise and disappointment, that the steamboat had left one hour previous. After a detention of fifteen hours, we set out for Keithsburg, per steamer Lamartine—distance, 90 miles down the river. Through frequent landings for freight, we did not reach K. till the morning of the 29th! The freight taken on board consisted of 500 barrels of flour, 2000 bushels of potatoes, 4000 bushels of onions, and a large lot of merchandize. Feeling that we ought to be put through in one day from Marengo, we were quite impatient at this tedious delay.

Our intention was to have gone through to Farmington to spend the Sabbath, and to have spent two days visiting on the way; but the steamer must make money, and we must submit.

From Keithsburg we took private conveyance to Little York, fourteen miles. Here resides a sister of Mrs. Jones, and, as might be expected, after a separation of fifteen years, there was a greeting, and tears of joy, and expressions of welcome, touchingly indicative of the strength of a sister's love. In the afternoon went to see a brother of Mrs. J., and other friends, in North Henderson, Warren Co., distance eight miles. Found here quite a colony of old acquaintances from Huntingdon, Pennsylvania.

Next day attended the funeral of a little girl, daughter of one of our old neighbors. At the house saw three younger children lying sick of a fever; two of them, on removing the coffin, made much ado;—'twas the last of their much-loved sister, who only a few days previous had played with them, and whom they had followed through prairie grass, plucking flowers and exulting in the merry shout of childish glee; but now the people are bearing her body away! Oh, how sad! Parent! father and mother! have you lost a child? If you have, you can in some measure realize how these parents felt, as they turned from those little mourners, and, mourning themselves, to follow the lifeless remains of the cherished one, and how those feelings must have deepened when the invalid children, too feeble to follow, began that affectionate yet inexpressible lament. Two miles over the prairie brought us to an unfenced grave-yard; a meeting-house stood near, but we did not enter it; the friends gathered around, some in waggons, some on foot, and then, without a hymn, a sermon, or a prayer, they lowered the dead to its final resting place. To us, the scene was strangely solemn, joined to an interest associated with the past, the present, and the future. The vast rolling and almost boundless prairie—the land-ocean—with now and then a habitation seen in the distance—our house in distant East, and one in prospect still further on—the mountains and valleys where most of this little group of sympathizing friends used to assemble to hear the writer hold forth the word of life—and finally the prospect of never seeing them again till the dead shall rise and come to judgment—all this was peculiarly impressive, and long to be remembered. Let not the reader infer from the absence of religious services at this funeral, the want of piety, or a taint of infidelity. Funeral services, and especially funeral sermons, are unfashionable among Presbyterians in Central Pennsylvania, and emigrants from that section of the State to the West have not yet learned what some others deem so essential to the burial of the dead.

While in this neighborhood, we visited the post-office, which we regard certainly as a curiosity—we do not think California can beat it for rusticity, sans souci, slip-and-go-easy confusion and security. It is situated upon the high road leading from Monmouth to Rock Island—a log house, without a yard, without lock and key, and without an inhabitant, not so much as a dog to guard it. You enter, and in one corner you see a bed, in another a cupboard of dishes, and in another is the cabinet or bureau of Uncle Sam—papers, letters, books, postage accounts, &c., all confusedly scattered and piled on the table, floor, or chimney corner, just as it happens,—nothing is lost, for the neighbors come and get their letters as best suits their convenience. The post-master lives a mile off, and comes to the house every other day to change the mail, apparently giving himself no concern about thieves or pilferers. This has been so for years, and no one has cause to complain; honest neighbors and an honest post-master do away with the necessity of bars and bolts, and the house even takes care of itself!

October the 2d, at 2 A. M., our brother-in-law took us in his lumber wagon, (they have no carriages in this country,) to Maccoun, within twelve miles of Farmington—distance forty miles. An extra wagon took us to F., where we arrived at P. M. During the night we traveled, or "lay our course by the stars"—western people say that this is about the only safe way of traveling by night—a strange mode of steering on land, which will soon be superseded by the rail and steam. But prairies are queer looking and acting objects to a stranger in the night season. You seem always approaching or going over a hill. When once off the road, the traveler does not go back, but strikes across the base of the triangle, till he comes to the right road, and then, reassuring by "the pointers" in the heavens, he hastens onward.

Our brethren at Farmington were too much scattered to think of having a meeting the evening of our arrival. The meeting at Adams Center, N. Y., occupying the 6th, we felt that we must leave the next day, which we did at 11 A. M., for Southampton, thirty miles north. Brother Dennis Saunders was our conductor. We arrived at 4 P. M. Held a meeting that evening in the house of Bro. Stillman; about forty present. The Southampton brethren are located near each other, on Ocean Prairie, and soon will be within a comfortable distance of market by railroad. To brethren going West, we recommend attention to this location as desirable on many accounts, viz., the richest of land, a fine climate, and enterprising brethren. Bro. John R. Butts took us in his wagon to Indian Town the morning of the 4th—distance thirty miles. There we took cars for Chicago, and thence to Detroit. The storm on the Lake delayed us, so that we did not arrive in Adams till the 7th, twenty-four hours after the meeting had commenced.

Thus happily terminated our first journey to the West. It was a rapid flight, yet we visited many places, scores of families, and transacted business of importance relating to the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom.

Petitions for the Maine Law.—The Grand Division of Sons of Temperance for Eastern New York has resolved to circulate for signatures the following memorial:—

To the Honorable the Legislature of the State of New York:—

Your petitioners would respectfully ask your Honorable Body to pass a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks.

This petition covers the whole ground, and if it were signed by every person who approves the design of it, and presented to the Legislature, that body would probably conclude that the people are in earnest, and act accordingly.

The Ohio Association.—A letter from Bro. Eli Forsythe, of Montra, Ohio, says:—"We had quite an interesting Association. Eld. T. E. Babcock being with us some days before the meeting convened, held a series of meetings, which resulted in the conversion of sinners, the reclaiming of backsliders, and the strengthening of the saints. He baptized sixteen while he was here, and two have been baptized since he left. We have meeting every other evening for prayer and conversation, and there seems to be quite an interest felt by some that have never yet made a profession of religion. The Episcopal Methodists have been holding a protracted meeting in the adjoining neighborhood, and I understand that they have taken some fifty into the church. May the Lord work mightily in the hearts of the children of men, to the pulling down of all sin and immorality in this place, that we may see many, even professors, acknowledging the truth as it is taught in his blessed Book."

European News.

By the steamer Arabia, which arrived on the 17th inst., we have European dates to the 5th inst.

By mail to London there is no further decisive news from the seat of war. The latest rumors are of a pacific turn. The rumor has again come up that a conference will be held at London for the settlement of the future of Turkey. From Vienna, too, the note of peace is sounded. The Earl of Westmoreland, British Minister at the Austrian Court, is said to have received an assurance from Constantinople that the representatives of the four Powers had succeeded in their efforts to bring the Divan to pacific sentiments, and consequently the orders sent to Omer Pasha enjoined him not to commence hostilities, the Embassadors having satisfied the Divan that the Czar had promised to make no offensive movement while waiting the result the effort at Constantinople in favor of peace.

By telegraph from Vienna, however, we have accounts of actual hostilities. A dispatch dated Nov. 4, says that the following is an official communication from Bucharest: 2,000 Turks appeared at Guirgevo, and fired into the town. In the conflict many Russians and Turks were killed. The turks retreated up the river, and the Russians followed them. At Kalefat there are daily skirmishes.

A dispatch dated Glasgow, Nov. 5, 1853, says: The ship Victoria, which sailed from the Bromillaw yesterday, took fire in proceeding down the Clyde, and was burned to the water's edge.

An inundation of the river had done much damage to the city of Cork. The water rose above the quays, and flooded all the lower streets. Business was generally suspended, and the stores on the flooded districts had to be closed. A portion of the quay near Camden place gave way, and caused the loss of eight to twenty lives, it being impossible to ascertain how many persons fell with it into the flood. The country for thirty miles round, was likewise inundated from the various streams, and a great many houses and trees were swept away. We have similar accounts from Limerick and Waterford.

On the 2d inst. the Earl of Shaftsbury presided at a meeting of the "Reformatory Institution for Adult Male Criminals," called to take an affectionate farewell of twenty-six "reformed" adult males, &c., who were about to be shipped off to the United States. The proceedings were highly interesting, especially to the criminals.

A boiler in the cotton mill of W. Hesketh, Blackburn, exploded and killed six persons, Nov. 2.

The Nile has this year risen higher than it has during the last 20 years. Almost the entire valley of Egypt is one sheet of water, and travelers proceed to the Pyramids in boats, an excursion which in ordinary times occupies a three hours ride from Ghizeh, the nearest point on the river. The damage done to the crops by this excess of water is very great, and very extensive tracts of land sown with Indian Corn are covered with from three to five feet of water, and the plants are consequently destroyed. The villages and towns are reduced to islands, and are only saved by the inhabitants raising embankments all round, which they watch day and night with the greatest anxiety. The Fellahs will severely feel the loss of their crop of Indian Corn, as it forms their principal article of food during the winter; so that, owing to this deficiency, and the demands for grain from Turkey, the Viceroy is not acting unwisely in limiting the exportation of corn.

The news from China leaves little room to doubt that the progress of the rebellion, or rather revolution, is so steady and uninterrupted, as to render it almost a certainty that, sooner or later, Tai-Ping's supremacy will be established, and the Ming Dynasty restored to the Chinese Empire.

The American Commissioner, Col. Marshall, succeeded in delivering his credentials to the New Viceroy of the three provinces of Kiang-su, Kiang-si, and Ngauhwui, at the City of Kaen-shan, about 66 miles to the west of Shanghai. The ceremony came off on the 4th of July. The Commissioner was received in the most favorable manner by the population, waited upon by deputations of Scholars and the Departmental authorities, and entertained in a sumptuous manner by the Viceroy. He delivered his credentials as Commissioner, which the Viceroy forwarded to Pekin. Kaenshan is a walled city, containing about 300,000 inhabitants, and is only 20 miles from Soo Chow, the great silk mart of China, and the most important inland city in the Empire. The Commissioner received an official invitation to visit the city, which he accepted. It was only last year that an American Missionary, who reached it in the disguise of a Chinaman, was apprehended, and ignominiously sent back to Shanghai. This is the first time that a foreign Commissioner has been received in the interior of China, in his proper character. Lords Macartney and Amherst went to Pekin, as tribute-bearers, in the eyes of the Chinese, and signally failed in the object of their missions. Col. Marshall will remain at Shanghai until he has received an answer from Pekin to his communication from the Emperor.

There has been some fighting at Amoy, and if not distinguished for the number of slain during the conflict, the result was attended with barbarous cruelties. The attack was made on the town by the Imperialists on the 27th August. There was fighting between the rival junks, and the upshot was that the Imperialists triumphed by a coup de main, capturing, it is said, four hundred of the patriots, the best part of whom were instantly beheaded, according to the economical procedures of the East. The Imperialists then began the destruction of the villages where the enemy had resided, killing the men and boys, and cutting off the breasts of the women who had nourished such a serpent-brood. There were some characteristic reprisals for this, and the rebels reëntered portions of the town. On the 31st of August the two armies arrayed themselves against each other two miles from the town, but with what result is not said.

A Double Murder.—An occurrence of the most distressing character took place in Ohio, near Lynchburgh, on the 6th inst., by which two men came to immediate death. A man named Lyons, whose wife died a short time ago, had shown symptoms of insanity for some time past; and on Sunday he visited Lynchburgh, where he procured a revolver or two. With these he returned to the house of Robert Hendrickson, who was his brother-in-law, and with whom he was living at the time, and made threats of violence against him. The pistols were taken from him, but he succeeded in getting possession of one of them again, and about 9 o'clock that night he followed Mr. Hendrickson out of the house into the yard, where he shot him in the back. He immediately fell to the ground, uttering an exclamation of anguish, when the infuriated man walked up to him, and placing the pistol close to his head fired again. He then deliberately placed the pistol to his own forehead, and lodged the contents of another barrel in his brain, falling forward and expiring immediately. Mr. Hendrickson survived but a short time. They were both men of families, and somewhat advanced in years. It is not known that there had been any difficulty between them previous to this sad occurrence.

SUMMARY.

A letter from Wisconsin, dated Oct. 15, says: The State is all alive with teams of all kinds, bearing the wheat crop to market. Farmers are in excellent spirits; for never has the crop been so fine as it is this summer, and the recent rise of flour has insured them excellent prices. They now get ninety-five cents per bushel as rapidly as they can deliver their grain in market. In the town of Kenosha, sixty-five thousand bushels were unloaded from wagons during the last week. The amount delivered in Milwaukee must have been very much greater. Thirty-thousand bushels are often unloaded there in a single day.

The Honorable Charles G. Atherton, U. S. Senator from New Hampshire, who commenced last March a new term of six years, is dead. He was the son of the Hon. Charles H. Atherton, a Federal colleague of Daniel Webster in the House of 1814–16, and a lawyer of eminent ability and worth, residing in Amherst, N. H., where Charles G. was born, though he resided for the last twenty years at Nashua. The younger Atherton has served with distinction in the New Hampshire Legislature and in Congress, having served in the House from 1837 to 1843, and in the Senate from '43 to '49, prior to his reëlection last year.

The New Jersey papers say that there is a prospect of a movement to contest the eligibility of Mr. Price, the newly elected Governor of New-Jersey, on the ground that he has not been a resident of the State for seven years preceding the election, as the Constitution requires. The Trenton State Gazette says: "Rodman M. Price has unquestionably received a majority of the votes cast, but the Constitution of the State yet stands between him and the Gubernatorial Chair. His claims are to be contested before another tribunal, and we have an abiding faith that he will be declared ineligible."

The bay gelding, who performed on Saturday, Nov. 12, the most remarkable feat of speed and bottom ever recorded in the history of the turf, died the same night. After he had performed that unprecedented race against time, going 100 miles in 8 hours and 58 minutes, he was taken to the stable, where he was bled, and then covered with six or eight thick blankets. It is the prevailing opinion among horsemen, that this superabundance of covering, while in an exhausted state, caused the death of this noble animal.

Luis de la Rosa, formerly Mexican Minister to the United States, and Senor Tornel, one of President Arista's Ministers of War, were both shot recently, somewhere near the northern boundary of Mexico, by order of Santa Anna. De la Rosa was Minister of Foreign Affairs immediately after the capitulation of the City of Mexico, and was the immediate instigator of Santa Anna's expulsion from the country, and wrote a letter informing him of his disgrace. The other victim was also implicated in the same transaction. Both were shot summarily, without pretense of trial.

A good deal of trouble and excitement exists at Ellsworth, Me., on account of the refusal of the town authorities to divide the School Money, at the instance of the Irish Catholics, so that the latter may establish a school of their own, from which the Bible will be excluded. Two Catholic boys broke into one of the school-houses by night, and destroyed all the Bibles found there, for which misdemeanor they were arrested, and one of them was sent to jail.

About nine o'clock on Monday morning, Nov. 14, the rear wall of the building on Vandewater-st., N. Y., formerly known as the "Mission Church," and destroyed by fire on Friday week, was blown down, burying one woman in the ruins, who was instantly killed, and injuring several persons who were inside. Six men were employed on the premises in getting out the rag stock injured by the fire, but all of them escaped injury. The persons hurt were engaged in getting fuel.

The Capitol of the State of Tennessee, now near completion, is said to be one of the finest buildings in the world. Its cost is a million of dollars. It is built of solid limestone, taken from near the hill on which it stands. The roof is of Tennessee copper, and the Speaker's stand of marble quarried in that State.

Since the 1st of April last more arrests for attempted frauds on the Pension Bureau have taken place, than took place during the whole previous period of the Government. But two were successful. These frauds were perpetrated in six States and were in a dozen cases.

A correspondent sends the Tribune the following under date of Great Bend, Pa., Saturday, Nov. 12, 1853; "The day Express train which left New York this morning at 6 o'clock, was completely demolished about one mile east of this place, at 1½ o'clock this afternoon. The train, consisting of four passenger cars and one baggage car, was runniug at a rapid rate, and in crossing a small wooden bridge was thrown from the track, and every car literally smashed. The accident was caused by the giving away of the string pieces. Several persons were considerably injured, but no one is considered dangerously hurt."

A collision occurred at the intersection of the New Jersey and Central Railroads, at Elizabethtown, on Tuesday afternoon, between a gravel train and a passenger train. Both trains approached the crossing and stopped in order to prevent a collision. After the adjustment of the switches, the switchman beckoned to the gravel train—which had the right of the road—to pass over. The signal was mistaken by the passenger train, which passed over first, but the locomotive of the gravel train struck the rear car, which happened to be empty, and demolished it, throwing the locomotive off the track.

Rev. Seth Alden, of Lincoln, expired in the pulpit of the Unitarian Church at Westborough, where he was officiating for the day, on Sunday. He was reading the first hymn in the afternoon service, when he was seen to sink down, and before assistance could reach him he was dead. It is a striking coincidence, that Rev. Samuel Ripley, who preceded Mr. Alden in the pastorate of the church at Lincoln, died instantly of an affection of the heart.

A fiend in human shape, named Thomas Motley, has been convicted at Walterborough, S. C., for the murder of a runaway slave. It was proved on the trial, that he first shot the slave, wounding him severely, and then whipped him; after which he put him in a vice, and subjected him to the most excruciating torture. He then set him loose, started bloodhounds after him, who ran him down, mangling him horribly, and finally cut him up and fed the dogs with his flesh.

A colored boy, named Lewis, was lately seized in Cincinnati as a fugitive slave, on claim of Mr. Marshall, of Kentucky. The boy was ably defended before the Commissioner, by Messrs. Birney and Joliffe; but the fugitive not choosing to wait for the decision, cut short the proceedings by escaping through a window, and taking the express line on the underground railroad for Canada, where he arrived safely.

An enterprise has been projected in this City, which promised to open a new market for our manufactures, and extend our commerce into regions where it has never before penetrated. A company with a capital of $100,000 purpose to send a first-class river steamer, 190 feet long, now nearly ready for sea, on a trading voyage to the head waters of the Amazon.

The emigration to Nebraska is stated by the St. Louis Democrat to be surprisingly great, and from day to day trains of wagons may be seen advancing upon the territory, not only from Missouri, but from Kentucky, Illinois, and other Western States. The civilized Indians resident in Nebraska cultivate their farms, are educated, and speak good English, and are desirous of becoming citizens of the United States.

The Washington Union publishes a letter from Attorney General Cushing, in relation to a recent case in Illinois, in which a suit was brought against a U. S. Marshal for damages for a wrongful arrest of a negro as a fugitive slave. Mr. Cushing says the case cannot be taken out of the State Courts, but advises the President to employ counsel to defend the Marshal.

A large quantity of counterfeit $5 bills, on the Butchers' and Drovers' Bank of Somers, N. Y., were found upon two men who were arrested at Little Falls for attempting to pass one of them. On searching their carpet bag a quantity of jewelry was also found. Let every one look sharp at the bills of the Butchers' and Drovers' Bank, Somers.

In Cumberland, N. Y., Lewis Brown, aged 16, has been detected in burning his father's barn and a big pile of lumber, and in the act of burning a neighbor's barn. He had also tied one of his father's oxen to a tree in a forest, where the animal starved to death—all because "the old man blew him up."

The number of acres of swamp land lying in the State of Missouri is reported to be 2,765,871, and in Illinois 2,370,635. Much of the land can and will be reclaimed, and, in general, the soil is so rich as to make it very valuable.

The number of deaths in New York last week, according to the report of the City Inspector, was 341, which is 33 less than that of the previous week. The deaths among children under one year amounted to one hundred, which is a decrease of twetny on the mortality among infants during the preceeding week. Of the deceased, two hundred and seventeen were natives of the United States, seventy-three of Ireland, twenty-nine of Germany, eleven of England, and six of Scotland.

An indisputable case of absence of mind is related by the Providence Journal: An old gentleman in that city got his hand caught in a machine on which he was at work a few days since, and jammed one of his fingers badly. Being in a great hurry, he quickly wrapped it up and went to work again. When he got home in the evening, he told his wife how badly he had hurt his hand, and took off the rag to show her, when he discovered that he had wrapped up the wrong finger.

The Five Point Mission seems to have a strong hold upon public sympathy. Land has been purchased for a Farm and House of Industry at East Chester, for which five thousand dollars were subscribed last week. The remaining five thousand dollars, it is thought, will be forthcoming.

DIED.

In North Stonington, Ct., on the 13th inst., of consumption, Mr. Cyrus W. Crary, aged 36 years. Bro. C. embraced the Sabbath some four years since, and united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, R. I., where he remained a member until his death. A little less than two years since he went to California in search of gold. While laboring in the mines he took cold, which settled on his lungs, and terminated in the disease which closed his earthly career. Though sinking rapidly under disease, he was permitted to reach home a few weeks before his death, where he enjoyed the great privilege of dying in the presence of his own family, from which he had been separated. In his last hours he expressed entire resignation to the will of his heavenly Father, and the strong expectation of soon entering into the joy of his Lord.

C. M. L.

In Hopkinton, R. I., August 2, (at the residence of her son, at Rockville,) Widow Betsey Lanphear, relict of Elisha Lanphear, deceased, in the 78th year of her age. Miscellaneous.

Let's Sit Down and Talk Together.

Let's sit down and talk together
Of the things of olden day,
When we, like lambkins loosed from tether,
Gaily skipped along the way.
Time has touched us both with lightness,
Leaving furrows here and there,
And tinging with peculiar brightness
Silvery threads among our hair.

Let's sit down and talk together;
Many years away have past,
And fair and foul has been the weather,
Since we saw each other last.
Many whom we've loved are living
In a better world than this,
And some among us still are giving
Too much thought for present bliss.

Let's sit down and talk together;
Though the flowers of youth are dead,
Sweet buds still grow among the heather,
And [illegible] their fragrance shed.
Life has thousand blessings in it
Even for the aged man,
For God has hid in every minute
Something for our eyes to scan.

Let's sit down and talk together;
Boys we were—we now are men;
We meet a while, but know not whether
We shall meet to talk again:
Parting time has come; how fleetly
Speed the moments, when their wings
Are fanned by breathings issuing sweetly
From a tongue that never stings!

A Beautiful Passage.

The following beautiful passage closes Horace Greeley's oration, delivered at the Indiana State Fair:—

"As for me, long tossed on the stormiest waves of doubtful conflict and arduous endeavors, I have begun to feel, since the shades of forty years fell upon me, the weary tempest driven voyager's longing for the land, the wanderer's yearning for the hamlet, where in childhood he nestled by his mother's knees, and was soothed to sleep on her breast. The sober down-hill of life dispels many illusions, while it develops or strengthens within us the attachment, perhaps long smothered or overlaid, for 'that dear hut, our home.' And so I, in the sober afternoon of life, when its sun, if not high, is still warm, have bought me a few acres of land in the broad, still country, and bearing thither my household treasures, have resolved to steal from the city's labors and anxieties at least one day in each week, wherein to revive as a Farmer the memories of my childhood's humble home. And already I realize that the experiment cannot cost as much it is worth. Already I find in that day's quiet an antidote and a solace for the feverish, festering cares of the week which environ it. Already my brook murmurs a soothing evening song to my burning, throbbing brain; and my trees, gently stirred by the fresh breezes, whisper to my spirit something of their own quiet strength and patient trust in God. And thus do I [illegible] realize but for a brief and fitting day, the serene joy which shall irradiate the Farmer's vocation, when a fuller and truer Education shall have refined and chastened his sensual cravings, and when Science shall have endowed him with her treasures, redeeming labor from drudgery, while quadrupling its efficiency and crowning with beauty and plenty our bounteous, beneficient Earth."

Tobacco.

The following is the Preface to the fifth edition of Uncle Toby on Tobacco:—

Tobacco is the twin demon of Alcohol. Very many of our young men and fine boys are being ruined by its power. The evil is coming upon the nation like a flood. Twenty thousand of our fellow-citizens, physicians say, are killed by it annually. The nation pays about $30,000,000, and the church about $5,000,000, in its yearly consumption. Its affinities are many and alarming. It leads to idleness, poverty, strong drink, vice, disease, delirium, and death. It is an insidious enemy, usually assailing the well being of individuals and the body politic in a slow and stealthy form. I have been a victim to the seductive power of this vile poison, and personal experience of sorrows inflicted, bids me do what I can to draw attention to its mischievous doings. Thus moved, I publish this little book. It is intended for Juvenile Libraries and Schools of every kind and grade. It aims to forestall iniquity, to nip the evil in the bud, and I am happy to believe, that with thousands of youth it has achieved its end, having proved "the ounce of prevention" in an eminent degree. In view of its adaptation to emergencies far and near, I cannot but wish it had universal circulation. George the Third, though our fathers branded him a tyrant, had some better streaks in his character. In the exuberance of his good wishes on one occasion, the monarch said, "I wish every poor man in my kingdom had a chicken in his pot." I am not a king, nor the son of a king; I am nothing more than simple-hearted Uncle Toby; but I wish that every poor boy in the land had my book in his hands, and also a chicken in his father's pot.

Remarkable Case of Somnambulism.

We have always been somewhat sceptical in regard to this remarkable phenomenon, and regarded with incredulity the wonderful feats of somnambulists, so often related, believing them to be greatly exaggerated. But seeing is believing, and we are now prepared to throw away all incredulity in the matter, as an instance recently came under our own observation, which completely dissipates all unbelief. The subject is a young man employed in this office, and the feats performed are truly remarkable.

The individual in question retired to rest about half-past ten o'clock, on Friday evening of last week, and in about half an hour after his retiring, we were aroused from our slumbers by a muttering sound, as of one talking in sleep. We immediately proceeded to his bedside, to awaken him; but we had scarcely laid hands upon him ere he bounded from us, and was soon in the open street. We could then do nothing but watch his movements, which were alike amusing and dangerous. After having run across the bridge over the creek in this place, which is nearly one hundred feet in length, he commenced walking the outer railings of the same, which are about four inches in thickness, and about fifty feet from the water below, in a careless and perfectly unconcerned manner. He then became a tenant of a neighboring pig-pen, and after stirring up its inmates, who received their guest with sundry grunts and squeals, and no doubt surprised at this unexpected midnight visit, he left them, and resumed his more dangerous peregrinations, by climbing a ladder, forty feet in length, which projected over a low building adjoining this office. Many other antics were performed which we have not the space to enumerate. On returning to the office, (still unconscious,) he was caught, and in his struggles to again escape, was awakened, when he was very weak and completely exhausted. He tells us he had been in the habit of walking in his sleep, though not recently.

The above statement is true, however remarkable it may appear.

Strawberries.

The practice of planting strawberries in August is a very good one well done, but very hazardous when performed with as little care as one would take in April. Every season we have to listen to hundreds of complaints concerning the loss of summer and autumn plantations of strawberries. The plants, in most cases, are feeble, the dry weather not allowing them to become well rooted. The ground is dry, and although the plants may have been set after a shower, the heat, sun, and dry air, soon leave the ground as dry as ever, and what can the plants do but die? We must suggest to those who desire to make a strawberry bed in August or September, to see in the first place that the ground is thoroughly wet. If rain does not happen to come at the right time, and in sufficient quantity, then apply the watering pot or engine, and drench it completely, until the water has gone down even to the subsoil. The plants may then be set. But when they are in the ground, even thus prepared for them, all is not over. If a brilliant sun shines upon them in its full force the day after they are planted, the chances are ten to one against their living. In such a case, a slight shade should be afforded for a few days. Evergreen boughs, or boards set on their edge and meeting at the top, forming a roof over the rows of plants, are easily applied.

If such a course as this is followed, strawberry plants may be set in any month of summer, and in any sort of weather. Nothing can be a greater waste of time than the very common method of planting in a soil as dry as ashes, and then dribbling a little water on every day. People say; "I cannot see why it is my plants die; I water them every day." They do not understand that this every-day sprinkling amounts to nothing more than to hasten the death of the plants. One good thorough soaking of the ground before the plants are set, will generally sustain them till re-rooted, and is worth a thousand sprinklings afterwards. [Gen. Farmer.

Effects of Lightning on Ships.

April 16, 1850, Capt. John Arrowsmith read before the London Electric Society, a paper "On the use of black paint in diverting the effects of lightning on ships," in which will be found a relation of lightning passing over the parts of the masts painted with lampblack and oil, without the least injury, while it shivered the uncoated parts, tearing out large splinters, so as to render the masts comparatively useless. It is the experience of thirty voyages, during which, on reference to his journals, the vessel he commanded had been at ninety-eight different periods within the vortex of the electric currents, and always escaped the effects of the electric fluid without having been once struck.

The results have confirmed Capt. Arrowsmith in the belief of the efficacy of the precautions adopted by him at the commencement of these voyages. Capt. Arrowsmith was first struck with this idea on reading the singular facts related of piebald cattle, horses, &c., struck by lightning. The repellant powers of certain colors, or rather the affinity of the fluid to those parts of the streaks in the animals which are white, being very remarkable, led him to adopt the use of black paint on the mast heads, yard-caps and trucks; and to take in and furl the upper and light sails, whenever forked lightning approached the vessel he commanded. Capt. Arrowsmith gives it as his experience, that "any part of a body composed of wood, sufficiently coated with black, or lampblack and oil, possesses a property of resisting the destructive effects of the electric fluid."

Cork.

Many persons see corks used daily without knowing from whence come those useful materials. Corks are cut from large slabs of the cork tree, a species of oak, which grows wild in the southern countries in Europe. The tree is stripped of its bark at about sixteen years old; but before stripping it off, the tree is not cut down, as in the case of the oak. It is taken while the tree is growing, and the operation may be repeated every eight or nine years; the quality of the bark continuing each time to improve as the age of the tree increases. When the bark is taken off, it is singed in the flames of a strong fire, and after being soaked for a considerable time in water, it is placed under heavy weights in order to render it straight. Its extreme lightness, the ease with which it can be compressed, and its elasticity, are properties so peculiar to this substance, that no efficient substitute for it has been discovered. The valuable properties of cork were known to the Greeks and Romans, who employed it for all the purposes for which it is used at present, with the exception of stopples. The ancients mostly used cement for stopping the mouths of bottles or vessels. The Egyptians are said to have made coffins of cork, which being spread on the inside with resinous substance, preserved dead bodies from decay. In modern times cork was not generally used for stopples to bottles till about the seventeenth century, cement being used until then for that purpose.

Population of China, &c.

The following statistics relating to the internal condition of China Proper, are taken from the statistical chart of a new work by Mr. R. Montgomery Martin, late her Majesty's Treasurer for the Colonial Consular and diplomatic services in China, and member of the Legislative Council at Hong Kong, entitled, "China, Political, Commercial and Social." In China Proper it appears there are 367,632,907 inhabitants, and in the dependencies of Mantchooria, Mongolia, Turkistan, Thibet, &c., about 40,000,000, making a total of 400,000,000 of people under one government. The population on each square miles is 388, and the area in square mile is 1,287,999. The quantity of land is estimated at 830,829,100 English acres, of which 141,119,347 is under cultivation. The land tax realizes 27,854,023 taels of silver; the salt revenue, 4,618,834 taels; and other duties, 994,092 taels. The total fixed revenue of the Provinces is 35,016,023 taels, of which sum 22,445,573 taels, and 3,428,955 shih of rice (a shih being about 160 lbs. averdupois) are transmitted to the Imperial Treasury, while 5,569,329 taels remain in the Provinces. The standing army and militia number 1,232,000 men. The table from which the above statistics are taken is prepared from various authorities, the greater portion having been furnished in China, and translated from the official records. With respect to the density of the population, Dr. Gutzlaf and other Chinese scholars consider the census to be correct. The population is most dense along the banks of the great rivers, particularly near the great Yang tse kiang, and the central districts of the country, where the waters furnish large supplies of food. The very great fecundity of the Chinese is visible in the smallest village. The natural productions of the various Provinces include every description of metal, as well as almost every known article of merchandise.

The Cost of a Bad Habit.

What a common thing it is for people to have some bad habit or other, which is useless, and worse than useless, but which they find it very difficult to break themselves of!

A story is told of a man in one of the New England States, who had such a habit, and who, one day, rendered himself very ridiculous by it. The habit this gentleman had, was one of frequently handling his spectacles. He was a member of the legislature of his State, and when he rose to speak, he would first place his spectacles on his nose, suffer them to remain there a minute or two, throw them upward upon his forehead, and finally fold them up and lay them before him on his desk.

One day a very important question came up in the legislature, and the fidgety gentleman commenced a speech in opposition to the proposed measure. A friend to the project, who was somewhat of a wag, determined that he would spoil the effect of what the honorable member had to say. So, before the speaker entered the house, after a recess, he provided himself with a dozen pairs of spectacles. The member commenced his speech with his usual ability. But a few minutes elapsed before he was at work with his spectacles, and finally got them upon his forehead. At this juncture our wag, who stood ready, laid another pair on the desk before the speaker. These were taken up, and gradually gained a place on his forehead by the side of the others. A third, fourth and fifth pair were disposed of in the same manner. A smile settled upon the countenances of the honorable members, which gradually lightened up into a grin, and at last, when the speaker had warmed up into one of his most patriotic and elegant sentences, he deposited a sixth pair with the others, and there was a loud and long peal of laughter from all quarters of the room. President, clerks, members, all joined in the chorus. The speaker looked around in astoishment at this curious interruption; but raising his hand, he grasped the spectacles, and the whole force of the joke rushed upon his mind. He dashed the glasses upon the floor, took his hat and left the hall. The bill was passed by a triumphant majority, probably in consequence of the gentleman's silly and useless habit.

Anecdote with a Moral.

A friend not long since told us a story in relation to one of our subscribers, (says Hill's Recorder,) which contains a moral for husbands, and also furnishes an example for wives which is not unworthy of imitation under similar circumstances:—

The subscriber referred to, said to our friend, in the presence of his wife, that it had been his intention to call at the Recorder office, to pay up his arrearages and discontinue his paper. His wife very promply asked:

"Why do you intend to discontinue the paper?"

"Because," said the husband, "I am so much away from home on business, and have so very little time to read, there seems to be very little use in taking the paper."

"Yes," responded the wife, "it may be of little use to you, but it is of great use to me. I remain at home while you are gone, and I wish to know what is going on in the world. If you discontinue the paper, I will go straight and subscribe myself."

As the paper has not been discontinued, we suppose the wife's reasoning was conclusive.

The moral of this incident must not be overlooked. A husband should consider the gratification and profit afforded his wife and children by the paper, as well as his own, and not discontinue it simply because he may not have the opportunity to read it regularly. And further, it may remind some good husbands not now subscribers, that it is their duty to take the paper, that their wives and children may know what is going on in the world.

EXTRAORDINARY INDUSTRY!—One of the most remarkable instances of industrious cleverness (says the Hamilton C. W. Canadian,) that has ever come to our knowledge, is the escape of Convict Oliver Dawsey from the Provincial Penitentiary at Kingston, on the night of the 28th ult. Dawsey is a colored man, who has some little reputation in our neighborhood, by robbing the houses of Mr. Notman, of Dundas, and Mr. Sadlier, of Hamilton, some time ago. In the Penitentiary he was noted for his sagacity and smartness, and had become rather a favorite with the officials, in so far as being employed in doing little neat jobs of handicraft was concerned. On the evening previous to his escape, however, he had offended, intentionally, it is supposed, and was confined in the dark cell, in the sunk story of the building, as a punishment for his refractory conduct. This, it appears, was exactly what he wanted, and, between the hours often at night and two in the morning, he suceeded in going through a stone wall three feet in thickness, and in scaling the wall of the building and the outer wall, one of which is about forty feet in height, and at the last named hour stood a free man beyond the limits of the Penitentiary! The three-feet wall through which he penetrated has been built for fifteen or sixteen years, and when it is known that the only instrument used was a piece of flat iron about thirteen inches in length, 1½ inches broad, and one-eighth of an inch thick, with a few nicks like the teeth of a saw on one end, it must be acknowledged that his industry and perseverance almost entitle him to a better fate than the dungeon of the Penitentiary. It is supposed that he has come westward, as he had frequently hinted during his confinement, that he had a considerable amount of money buried in the vicinity of Hamilton.

RECREATION NECESSARY.—The Journal of Health contains some most excellent hints on the necessity of recreation as a means of preserving health and strength. Hard students should give attention to the following suggestions:—

"It is very generally recognized and admitted, that deprivation of air and exercise is a great evil; but it is not so well known that abstinence from occasional recreation or amusement is also an evil of no slight magnitude. It is, however, a primary law of animal economy, that no organ can maintain its integrity without regular recurrent periods of activity and of rest. In the case of the muscular system, if any muscle or set of muscles cease to be used, it wastes and disappears; but if it be used too much, it becomes strained and loses its power. It is the same with the nervous system; if the brain be never exercised, its energy is impaired; but if it be over exercised, its energy is exhausted."

THE DEER AND THE TURTLE.—The Cornwall (Canada) Freeholder, relates the following hunting incident as an absolute fact. There are some curious things that happen in the ordinary routine of life:—

"As two hunters were hunting on the banks of the River Nacion, near Crysler's Mills, their dogs pressed close on a deer, which took to the river, where the hunters pursued it in a canoe. On approaching the animal, they were surprised to perceive it struggling desperately, being every now and then jerked suddenly under water. The hunters immediately approached, and with the aid of others at hand, dragged the deer into the canoe, when, to the astonishment of all present, a large turtle, weighing forty pounds, was found firmly fastened to the tail of the deer, which would have undoubtedly been shortly drowned by its amphibious assailant. The turtle retained its grip for upwards of two hours after the deer was killed. This extraordinary circumstance is attested to by several witnesses."

BOILER-BURSTING PREVENTED.—The Nashville Banner editor has seen and examined an invention, which, he says, puts it out of the power of an engineer to explode a boiler, either through negligence or purposely. This improvement provides the upper part of the boiler with two openings or apertures in addition to that for the safety-valve, and the bottom of the boiler with one. These apertures are closed by one cylinder and piston and by two valves which are arranged to pass the water from the boiler on to the fire under it, when the steam gets to a given hight, thus dampening down the fires, and preventing explosion should the safety valve or engineers fail to perform their functions. This safety guard is intended to be independent of the engineer, beyond his control entirely, to be inclosed, locked up, and the key placed in the possession of the Captain, the Inspector having previously determined the amount of pressure the boiler will bear, and adjusted the pea upon the lever accordingly. In the experiment on Wednesday, when more steam was raised than was necessary, the extra quantity immediately lifted the guard, and the water rushed out upon the fire and put it out, soon reducing the steam to the proper point. This improvement can be adapted to the locomotive boiler, and all other steam boilers.

NEWSPAPERS.—There is hardly anything so much needed in a family as a newspaper, and yet, comparatively speaking, nothing is esteemed of so little value. Every one who will make a fair trial, and observe the influence of reading over his family, will find at the end of the year, that he is not a cent the poorer for having been a subscriber to a good newspaper. He will have accumulated more real intelligence of the every day concerns of life and the movements of nations—we take it for granted that he has perused every number with avidity—than he would have done in a series of years deprived of the sight thereof. His wife will have picked up much information relative to the government of children, many useful lessons of household economy, and no small share of instruction suited to her situation. The children will have acquired a degree of information worth the price of subscription ten times told. In fact, a good, virtuous and well conducted newspaper in a family, is the best economist of time and money, and the aptest instructor of the mind.

IMPORTANT SCIENTIFIC INVENTION.—It is well known that the paper prepared for photography grows more or less black by the rays of light falling on it. A young painter, M. Schall, of Berlin, has just taken advantage of this property in photographic paper to determine the intensity of the sun's light. After more than 1,500 experiments, M. Schall has succeeded in establishing a scale of all the shades of black which the action of the solar light produces on the photographic paper; so that, by comparing the shade obtained at any given moment on a certain paper with that indicated on the scale, the exact force of the sun's light may be ascertained. Baron Alexander von Humboldt, M. de Littnow, M. Dove, and M. Pongendorff have congratulated M. Schall on his invention; which will be of the highest utility, not only for scientific labors, but also in many operations of domestic and rural economy.

CHANGE OF FORTUNE.—Mr. Samuel Brannan, of San Francisco, has an annual income of $250,000. In 1840 Mr. Brannan was a poor and penniless printer in New York, and worked in the Democrat office, for Messrs. Belton & Livingston. About nine years ago he arrived at New York, from the West. A crownless hat, with coat and unmentionables to match, were not very prepossessing recommendations for the adventurer. He succeeded, however, in joining the New York division of the Mormons, and for more than a year was editor of their paper. Brannan, with three or four hundred of the persecuted "Saints," became attracted by the glowing description given by Fremont and others of California. They chartered the ship Brooklyn, and immediately sailed for the future El-Dorado, where Mr. B. has amassed an immense fortune. [Mobile Register.

BRIGHT AND GLOOMY HOURS.—Ah! this beautiful world. Indeed I know not what to think of it. Sometimes it is all gladness and sunshine, and heaven itself is not far off. And then it changes suddenly and is dark and sorrowful, and the clouds shut out the sky. In the lives of the saddest of us, there are bright days like this when we feel as if we could take the great world in our arms. Then come the gloomy hours when the fire will neither burn in our hearts nor on our hearths; and all without and within is dismal, cold and dark. Believe me, every heart has its secret sorrow, which the world knows not; and oftentimes we call a man cold when he is only sad.

VARIETY.

A writer says that the vital difference between man and woman is this—man forever asks more, while woman is always intent upon making the most of what she has. Man is a perpetual seeker; woman turns whatsoever she finds into a present use and profit. Man's eye is fixed upon the future; woman's upon the present. He sweeps the heavens with his gaze to see what fairer worlds invite his adventure; she quietly unpacks the trunk of his observation, and appropriates whatever available results it contains to the improvement of his present abode.

In the examination of an Irish case recently, before the Court of Magistrates, for assault and battery, the counsel, in cross-examining one of the witnesses, asked him what they had at the first place they stopped? He answered, "Four glasses of ale." "What next?" "Two glasses of wine." "What next?" "One glass of brandy." "What next?" "A fight, of course!"

Modesty is one of the leading characteristics of great minds. Newton, whose discoveries filled the world and revolutionized the whole empire of science, was one of the most unassuming of men. The mighty intellect and vast achievements of Laplace only rendered him more conscious of his own ignorance; so true it is, that the more men know, the less do they think of themselves.

Talent is, so to speak, a Hand to do things with; Genius is an Eye; hence the impersonality of the one and the personality of the other. There are men of talent without genius—adroit, useful, able men; there are also men of genius without talent—bungling, inarticulate, neglected, wailing, unhappy victims, with inordinate ambition and little power.

The Boston Traveler relates the following instance of the advantages of Savings Banks. "We saw to-day the book of a person who, twenty years ago, deposited in one of our savings banks the sum of three hundred dollars. Since that time it has neither been increased by deposits, nor diminished by drafts, and today the interest has accumulated so that the person has $1025 86 standing to her credit."

The less of physical force or menacing language we use—the less, to take an expressive word, we scold our children—the more order and quiet we shall commonly secure. I have seen a family where a single word, or a look even, would allay a rising storm. The gentle but firm method is the very best security for domestic peace.

The Buffalo Republic says: A little boy, clad poorly, standing in front of the Western Hotel, was accosted this morning by a rude young man, with the question, "Does your mother know you'r out?" The little fellow looked at the interrogator a moment, while his bosom heaved and tears gathered in eyes, and replied, "Sir, my dear mother is dead."

The author of the well-known song, "Sweet Home," once said that he had been a wanderer from his boyhood, and often, when in some of the great cities of Europe, he had heard persons singing his song when he had not a shilling with which to buy his next meal, or a place where to lay his head.

"Slowly and surely" is a good motto. Impetuous zeal sometimes effects good results; but it is generally in despite of impetuosity, and not because of it. There is always safety in calmness and deliberation. A little forbearance never does harm, but the want of its exercise sometimes retards what it seeks to promote.

A passing traveler in the back woods met with a settler, near a house, and inquired, "Whose house?" "Mog's." "Of what built?" "Logs." "Any neighbors?" "Frogs." "What is the soil?" "Bogs." "The climate?" "Fogs." "Your diet?" "Hogs." "How do you catch them?" "Dogs."

There is a woman named Engettje Van der Vhies, 66 years old, residing near Rotterdam, who has not eaten in 35 years, nor drank in 31 years; so says a Netherland paper. She is visited by doctors and professors from far and near, but no one can discover the secret of this strange phenomenon.

A correspondent writes from Troy, that a few nights since, two men drank rum upon a wager at a rum-hole in Congress-st. in that city. One of them cheated by throwing the liquor under the table or over his shoulder; the other drank 37 glasses, and died in consequence.

Cyrus T. Clark, of Bangor, has purchased the standing timber at the head waters of the Saint Francis, and has contracted to send six million feet over the Portland and Montreal railroad in 1854, and seventeen millions in 1855.

In the United States Circuit Court at Philadelphia, Judges Grier and Kane granted a special injunction against Isaac Brown and others, restraining them from infringing the Woodworth planing-machine patent in the District of Kensington.

A Connecticut minister having walked through a village church-yard, and observed the indiscriminate praises bestowed upon the dead, wrote upon the gate-post the following line:—

"Here lie the dead, and here the living lie!"

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address

NARRATIVE OF ELIZABETH WILSON.

BY WILLIAM M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

Introduction.

It has been correctly remarked, by a distinguished writer, that "truth is stranger than fiction;" which is verified in innumerable unwritten histories of the bleeding heart in private life, and the untold tales in the quiet walks of humble society: and although the sad fate of Elizabeth Wilson has, at times, attracted much interest, and even vague inklings of her history have been woven into jejune fictions, yet her true, unvarnished story, is replete with instruction and admonition to the young, and even to the more advanced in life, far beyond those mawkish, ephemeral, fancy sketches; and as it has been the lot of the writer to be thrown into free intercourse with several persons somewhat familiar with her case, or prominently connected, in some manner, with the sad drama, I have frequently been tempted, for thirty years past, to pen a cursory notice of her touching narrative—a narrative as much calculated as any work of the imagination can possibly prove, to enforce the Scriptural admonition, "the way of transgressors is hard," and "the wages of sin is death," in their most trying, in their most fearful phases: in penning which I wish to add, that I derived all the prominent facts from the most reliable and most authentic sources, namely, 1st, From Elder Fleeson, an aged Baptist minister, usually called "Father Fleeson," who was her spiritual adviser, and who attended her in her last sad moments—a devout Christian man, highly respected in his denomination, and who was called to his rest more than a quarter of a century since; 2d, From James Trimble, Esq., Deputy Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, from the formation of the State Government, in 1790, till some fifteen or eighteen years since, and who was Secretary of the Provincial Council at the time the case of Elizabeth Wilson came before that body for its action; and, 3d, From my own grandfather's family, with whom the brother of Elizabeth, William Wilson, resided at the period in which her history lies.

Elizabeth Wilson, a beautiful and lovely girl, who flourished during the latter part of the Revolutionary War, descended from highly respectable parents, in an humble sphere of life, in Delaware County, Pennsylvania, whose only misfortune was their poverty; yet, with little of this world's goods, scarcely any one in the Province possessed more upright, honest hearts, than both her parents. They toiled, under many restraining circumstances, which it is not necessary to rehearse, for a livelihood; and to maintain an honorable and unblemished reputation; indeed, so rigid were they to the line of probity and rectitude, in all matters, that their stern, severe sense of correct bearing, was proverbial, and all persons, high and low, bowed to their elevated estimate of character and integrity.

In such a school was the beautiful and lovely Elizabeth Wilson, a beloved and cherished child, educated. No parents could be fonder of an offspring, and none labored more indefatigably to give their child a good education, and instil into her mind and her heart, true nobility of character, and the purifying principles of the Gospel of their Divine Redeemer. She grew into womanhood the pride of her parents and the admiration of the whole neighborhood in which they lived, some twenty miles from the city of Philadelphia.

At the time the British Army occupied Philadelphia, she made a visit to some friends in that city, and attracted a great deal of attention. Her relatives favoring the Tory or English Party, she was thrown into frequent intercourse with several of the British officers, who constantly visited her friends. Their attentions and flatteries intoxicated Elizabeth's unsophisticated mind; and after her return home, she became restless and unhappy. Anxious, all the while, to renew her visit to the city, against which so many obstacles were raised, and so many remonstrances were opposed, by her parents, at length, maugre their remonstrances and their insuperable objections, she left her home clandestinely, and went to an acquaintance, who was, formerly, from her own neighborhood in the country, but who now kept the old "Indian Queen Hotel" in the city; at which several of the English officers, with whom she had become acquainted on her former visit, boarded, and rendered some service in the affairs of the house, to have a parlor support.

Prior to Elizabeth's first visit to the city, yea, for five years, from sixteen to twenty-one years of age, she was deeply exercised on the subject of religion, and gave many evidences of truly loving the Lord, but never made a public profession of her faith. Immediately after setting out for the city, her good old father and mother followed her, to induce her to return to their roof; but she resisted every persuasion, every entreaty, and persisted in remaining where she might enjoy the benefits of society, as she regarded it.

* * * * *

In the city Elizabeth was surrounded by numerous admirers, nay, flatterers, all vieing to bestow pleasant attentions upon her; carrying her to every place of amusement, and leading her into every scene of gay dissipation. Like a whirligig, Elizabeth went day after day and night after night, amid the rivalry of hosts of admirers. Attentions, devotions, and offers of matrimony, were lavishly proffered to her, by one and by another. The poor girl was too simple hearted, too artless, too little acquainted with the ways of the world, too unsuspecting, to understand all this adulation, until she found it proved her ruin. How few poor, beautiful girls, ever discern the cloven foot of such attentions, until they are left to mourn their folly. So it proved with Elizabeth Wilson. The apparently brightest gentleman and the bravest soldier, Captain Deshong, won her heart and her entire confidence; of which he took an undue, a dishonorable, a damnable advantage. In a word, when he had gained her heart, he basely robbed her of her honor.

* * * * *

I stop not to pourtray the sad, sad state of one in such circumstances, nor to trace the process by which a villain may accomplish his fiendish purposes. The sad fact disclosed itself, and she was turned into the street to wander about, helpless, destitute, degraded, and almost dying of a broken heart.

* * * * *

A thousand emotions of her anguished breast might be pourtrayed, and a thousand scenes of poignant degradation might be depicted, in which she drank the very dregs of insult and contumely, until worn down to the lowest condition of wretchedness to which a woman, retaining some sense of propriety, can be reduced; yet I have no desire to give my pen to the wiles of a perfidious dastard, nor harrow up the vain regrets of an injured one: it must suffice, that she was a poor stricken outcast, without finding one to pity or one to aid her in her extremity; and when so prostrated by exposure and oppressive infirmity, she, in her desperation, betook herself to a market wagon just leaving the city, one afternoon, and reached her father's house late in the night.

On arriving at the gate leading to her natal roof, which stood a short distance from the public road, she could scarcely crawl to the old cottage; and when she neared the threshhold, she sank on the step, in intense agony, and was unable to knock for admittance. Her moanings, however, awoke her good old parents, who had not seen any thing of her, nor had any special tidings of her for more than a whole year; but hoisting the window inquired, "Who's there?" "A poor sick woman," was the laconic reply, uttered, evidently, by one in much anguish. They knew not who she was; but the reply was enough—it was a suffering, helpless fellow mortal, and they went down stairs, immediately, and opened the door, as it was a bright moonlight night. They found her in writhing agonies, unable to speak, and took her in and laid her on a settee, without recognizing her. There she lay, a poor, haggard wretch, suffering almost, the agonies of death, while the old gentleman went to light a candle. As the light was brought into the room, Elizabeth, in the throes of intense pain, caught a glimpse of her mother's face, and revealed herself, by exclaiming: "O, mother! O, mother!" Her mother sank to the floor, and her father, simultaneously, threw himself into a high-back chair, both overwhelmed with the discovery of her being their child, and they both continued almost insensible, a short time, until roused by the cries of two babes, of which Elizabeth had just become the mother.

* * * * *

Dark hours, dark hours—sad nights, sad nights—bleeding hearts, bleeding hearts—for days and weeks, and months and months, settled upon father, and mother, and daughter.

* * * * *

Elizabeth had become somewhat accustomed to insult and reproach, but her old parents, her upright, self-conscious parents, who had never dreamed of such a disgrace entering their door, were ground to the very earth. The iron entered their hearts;—they smiled no more—they spoke no more in their wonted tones—sad and cheerless, in the darkest corners of the house, they sat and wept and wept for weeks and months alone.

* * * * *

Soon as Elizabeth had gained sufficient strength to reach the city, she mounted her father's horse one morning before day light, and set off in search of her deceiver and seducer, who had been ordered to some other station, or who had voluntarily absented himself, on the plea of orders, just before Elizabeth's situation was discovered. On her arrival at the "Indian Queen," she found Deshong, who affected to be pleased to see her; and having spent a few hours together, she again mounted her horse, and reached her father's house and impatient babes late in the evening.

* * * * *

The following Sunday, after her parents had gone to church, she dressed herself and her babes, and started down the road towards Newtown Corner; leaving word that she had gone to be married. No more was heard of the marriage of Elizabeth, or of her babes, until some weeks afterward, a hunter, or rather his hounds, discovered two murdered infants concealed under a felled tree; which proved to be Elizabeth's twins. They were taken to her father's house, where they were fully recognized, and a Coroner's Jury was held on them; who, without any hesitation, charged the guilt on the absent mother.

* * * * *

Ah! who can tell the agony, the poignant agony, an unfaithful, an ungrateful child, may inflict on her fond, doting parents. It was not enough that their wayward child had brought disgrace upon herself, and sorrow, the saddest sorrow, upon her aged parents; but now to become a murderess—to imbrue her own hands in the blood of her illicit progeny, was a cruelty, a perfidy, not to be entertained by the lowest grade of human being: but that was the estate to which Elizabeth brought her good, her indulgent old parents. What a sad commentary—what a sad requital for parental tenderness and devotion! Who can understand a parent's anxiety, and who understand a parent's wrongs, from an inconsiderate, an ungrateful child?

* * * * *

An outrage of such enormity, and of such a person as Elizabeth Wilson, roused the whole community; and, after a diligent search, she was arrested and committed to the jail in Chester. To no one did she make any revelation of the horrid crime—to no one would she open her mouth, though constantly overwhelmed with tears, and evidently penitent. She did nothing but weep and utter ejaculations for mercy from on high.

* * * * *

The County Sessions soon arrived. The Grand Jury found a true bill against her, and she was arraigned for trial. To the indictment she made no reply, pro nor con. To the inquiry from the Judge, "Whether she had any Counsel?" she made no answer; a shower of tears and an ejaculation to her Saviour for mercy, was her only reply. The Court put in the plea of "Not Guilty, and to be tried;" and likewise appointed Counsel for her. Her Counsel asked for delay of the case until next day, that he might have a confidential interview with her, and prepare for trial, which was readily granted.

* * * * *

On entering the Court next morning, her Counsel announced that he did not know what course to pursue; that with all his entreaties, and all his warnings to his client, he could not win nor extort a single word from her. He felt confident that there was something exceedingly strange—something very peculiar, in the case, which induced him to ask postponement to the next Sessions. Judge Atlee, seeing that the issue must be fatal, in the goodness of his heart, deferred the trial until the next term.

Meanwhile, every effort was made to obtain some clue to the mystery which appeared to enshroud the case; but to no one would Elizabeth open her mouth on the subject. Her father and mother could see her no more. In their estimation she had disgraced herself, dishonored them, and forfeited all claims to her kindred.

* * * * *

The Sessions again returned, and Elizabeth was put on the stand for trial. To all that was said, and all that was done, Elizabeth was immovably silent, save her touching tears. No one, nay, not any one, could win or extort a single word, but her frequent ejaculations, to her Redeemer, for mercy. The evidence was decidedly against her. Her Counsel had not any testimony to advance, nor any thing to rebut what had been presented by the prosecution. The crowded court-room was intensely agitated by the strange reserve of Elizabeth; and the Attorney-General gave the case to the Jury, on the evidence, without a remark, and left her Counsel to make the best appeal to the sympathies of the Court and Jury; for all persons present, by this time, felt intensely in regard to the issue of the case; heightened by the very singular, the very mysterious position of the prisoner.

Her Counsel did all that man could do in the circumstances. He was learned—he was logical—he was eloquent—poetically eloquent—he kept the Judge, and the Jury, and all the by-standers, in tears for hours; but he could not gainsay one particle of the testimony adduced by the prosecution; which, of course, must be fatal, for Jurors are sworn to decide according to the testimony, and not by their own individual feelings, or the eloquence of Counsel.

Judge Atlee, in charging the Jury, called upon Elizabeth to communicate any thing to extenuate the crime, which should be used to her advantage, and warning her of her very precarious position; yet she uttered no word, save, "Jesus have mercy on me—have mercy on me," and flooded her face with streams of tears.

* * * * *

The Jury, after a few hours deliberation, returned a verdict of "Guilty of Murder in the First Degree;" and she was sentenced to be executed on the sixth day of December ensuing.

* * * * *

The poor criminal was closely confined to her solitary cell, to prepare for her awful doom. She was attended daily by Elder Fleeson, and another minister, who informed the writer, that they, through a long life, never witnessed stronger evidences of deep penitence, and richer exercises of soul, in any inquirer looking heavenward, save her imperturbable silence in reference to the crime. The only thing that excited their fears was her obstinate concealment of the facts or circumstances connected with the murder, while she asserted her innocence of the act or any agency in it. All their efforts to enlighten her on the moral bearing of the transaction, while she concealed any thing of the matter, proved futile—useless—she maintained the same imperturbable, dogged silence, though she was willing to die for the crime. Notwithstanding they were confounded by her unbroken silence on the main point, still they believed her perfectly innocent, from her deep humility, her great and faithful wrestling in prayer, and her uncomplaining submission. Many of her impromptu exercises of heart were preserved by the attending clergymen, and many of her sad, sad emotions of soul, which she recorded on scraps of paper in her solitary moments, were preserved, and part of which, given to the writer, by Elder Fleeson, fully justify their opinion of her perfect innocence.

* * * * *

While the foregoing matters were transpiring, and Elizabeth was entirely deserted by all her family, a favorite brother, William, whom she had not seen for years, and who was residing with the writer's grandfather, in a retired part of Lancaster county, had not heard any thing of the degradation of his sister; yet, while engaged one day, at his ordinary pursuit, came suddenly to a stand, dropped his work, and announced to his companions, that he must go to Delaware county immediately; and went to the house to prepare for his journey. To all the inquiries of the family, who esteemed him very highly, and to whom he was very much attached, respecting his purpose, and especially the suddenness of his determination, his only reply was, "I do not know—I must go and see what it is." He started within an hour after his first determination, with only a change of clothing, promising to be back within a week.

* * * * *

On his arrival at the disconsolate cottage of his aged parents, he first learned of his sister's disgrace and ignominious doom. After hearing the sad recital of her folly and her guilt, he expressed a desire to go to Chester and see her. To this his parents objected decidedly. His father's sturdy Puritanical principles—his high, his unyielding adherence to correct deportment, and his dislike to any appearance of participating in, or in any wise giving countenance to the crime, or the criminal, forbade it positively.

* * * * *

It would occupy too much space, in a simple sketch, to embody the arguments of the father and the son on this point; for the mother, the yearning mother secretly sided, with William, though she did not dare to express it. Notwithstanding the old gentleman's inexorable objections to William's visit, he persisted in the determination, which impelled him on to Chester, to ascertain something of Elizabeth, and the opinion abroad there respecting her; however, with an almost positive promise to his parents, not to see his sister.

* * * * *

For several days before, as I learned from Elder Fleeson, the great burden of Elizabeth's prayers, was, that the Lord would direct her brother William to her in her great extremity. This was her incessant, her wrestling prayer, for days and nights preceding that period.

On entering Chester, two days before the time appointed for her execution, he heard much said on the subject, and much of that to interest him, for he found all persons sympathizing deeply with his sister, while not a single being uttered a harsh word against her. Loitering about without making himself known to any one, he approached the prison walls, and while passing underneath a grated window, he heard the suppliant voice of his importunate sister, earnestly beseeching the Lord's interposition for an interview with her brother William.

In an instant he bounded to the prison door, and made himself known to the Sheriff, who ushered him into Elizabeth's cell, while yet she and the two clergymen remained engaged in prayer.

* * * * *

So soon as composure was restored after a surprise of this nature, and under such peculiar circumstances, she proposed a private interview with her brother. He replied, that if it was a purely personal matter, he would cheerfully do so, and engage to do any thing she might desire; but if it had any connection with the crime, he could not hear her except before two or more witnesses.

Together with the two clergymen, the Sheriff, Judge Atlee, the Prosecuting Attorney, and her own Counsel, were immediately introduced, and she revealed the whole matter. The following is the substance of her statement:

On her hurried trip to Philadelphia, on horseback, I have already mentioned, she met Deshong, her deceiver; he appeared to sympathize with her, and made an arrangement to meet her at Newtown Corner on the next Sunday, to marry her, and provide for her children; but, contrary to her expectations, he met her in advance, two miles from her home, along the road leading through a dense wood. When they met, he accosted her kindly, and led her a little way into the woods to rest on a log. She went with him a short distance and sat down on a felled tree, with both her children in her arms. He asked for one of the children, to see whether it looked like him; after a little pause, he laid the infant on the ground, then snatching the other one from her, laid it beside its fellow innocent. He then requested her to take their lives; which she peremptorily refused to do, but begged him to spare them, and let her take care of them herself, which she was willing to do, even had she to beg bread for them. He gruffly replied, that "he had no mercy for a strumpet nor her bastards;" and presenting a pistol to her breast, forbade her to utter a word at the peril of her life, and then wickedly stamped on their little breasts until they were entirely dead; and still keeping the pistol at her breast, he forced her solemnly to swear, on peril of her life and her soul's eternal torture, that she would never reveal the dreadful act; to which she, through fear, consented. "To the truth of this statement," she added, "I appeal to the Searcher of Hearts, before whose dread tribunal I am to appear next day after to-morrow."

The foregoing declaration being placed in the form of an affidavit, and attested by the Clergymen, the Sheriff, the Judge, and the Prosecuting Attorney, William started off with all speed to Philadelphia; and had it presented to the Provincial Council, in which body the pardoning power was then vested.

The Council granted a respite for four weeks, to give themselves time to inquire into the matter, and, as is customary in such cases, attached a Death Warrant, in the event that they should not deem it proper to extend any further clemency. William carried the joyful tidings to Chester, and then returned to the City to attend to affairs before the Committee, to whom the matter had been referred.

After bringing before the Committee a number of persons, of highest respectability, to establish so far as could be done, the probability of the statement, and fortify it by testimonials of previous good character, the Chairman of the Committee told William, that he might return home and rest assured that a full pardon would be decreed.

On this assurance William returned to his employment on the farm of the writer's grandfather, with the arrangement, that Elizabeth should follow him to Lancaster county so soon as released; where he would provide for her, and immediately made arrangements to give her a home, away from the scenes and the taunts of her folly.

* * * * *

Not hearing from Elizabeth as was arranged, he became very uneasy, as the expiration of the respite approached, and two days before that period he left, again, as precipitately as before, for Chester. He arrived at that place about noon the day before the expiration of the respite, and not finding a pardon nor any tidings of it from the Sheriff, or any one in authority, he set off to the city, after losing several hours in hopeless search for the promised document.

It was after nightfall when he got there. The Council had adjourned until the next morning; but on applying to the Chairman of the Committee, who had charge of the affair, and whom he found in a sick chamber, he was informed, that the Committee had agreed unanimously to grant a full pardon; but that he had been taken very ill, and had continued so for weeks, through which it had been overlooked, and, consequently, had not been brought before the Council for final action. He further informed him, that the Report and accompanying papers were in his desk in the Council Chamber, and directed him what course to pursue to have it acted upon without delay.

It was now getting late in the evening, and it could not be delayed until the assembling of the Council next day. Upon this representation Dr. Franklin, the President of the Council, summoned a special session, at a late hour of the night, amid the most inclement storm—so inclement and so rainy, that it was with the utmost difficulty a quorum could be gotten together by midnight.

* * * * *

It took but a few minutes to dispatch the business. The Report was read and adopted, and the Pardon fully consummated, and handed to her kind brother; but it was impossible for him to get across the Schuylkill at that time of night, and in such a pelting storm, there being no bridge at that day.

* * * * *

Next morning, as day dawned, William was at the Ferry House, knocking most lustily for the ferryman; but it rained and stormed faster and faster, and the banks of the river were greatly overflowed, while the stream in the channel was rushing down in a most violent torrent—so wild and furious, that no one would venture to cross the stream.

* * * * *

All his entreaties, all he could proffer, would not, could not, tempt the hardest of the most reckless men to cross; and after waiting and sueing in vain until within two hours of the expiration of the respite, he plunged into the stream, on his charger, with the pardon in his hat, secured by a handkerchief under his chin. The horse labored valiantly against the whirling current, but meeting not only the irresistible force of the wild waters and frightful whirlpools, heavy pieces of timber came pelting him anon, and turned him out of his course, time after time, until the noble animal became exhausted and sunk; leaving William to struggle with the raging elements and the terrific current. The utmost interest and consternation prevailed at this moment, among the beholders on the shore, great numbers of whom had gathered, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, to see the swollen stream, and the daring effort of the devoted brother. With a prowess that few men could boast, he battled manfully against the fretted waters, and eventually made the opposite shore; but not until he had been swept nearly two miles from the place where he entered the stream. After a considerable loss of time, he procured another horse, and set out at full gallop for Chester.

* * * * *

About noon the storm abated, and no pardon having arrived, the painful duty of the kind Sheriff became imperative, and he proceeded to the place of execution, attended by a large number of persons, who had been confident, up to that moment, that the revolting scene of executing a woman, a young, beautiful, and much injured woman, would be averted; and so confident were they that Elizabeth's brother would yet arrive with the pardon, and so reluctant was the Sheriff to proceed, that he not only determined to delay the execution until the last moment of specified time in the Death Warrant, but sent out several deputies, appointed, qualified and instructed for the occasion, to occupy the road at proper distances for a few miles towards Philadelphia, to give signal with white flags upon inspection of the document, should William approach at the last instant, and formed an avenue through the crowd to be kept open by the constables, to facilitate access to the High Officer of the County on reaching the solemn scene.

The time, to the last minute, was occupied in religious exercises—solemn, solemn worship; but the multitude saw little, and heard less of it, for their eyes were, all, gazing to the distance of the road, in the hope of catching a glimpse of William, or the signal of his approach.

* * * * *

The last moment arrived. Elizabeth stood up and confirmed the statement she had previously made, on the testimony of a dying woman; and then, folding her hands across her breast, called upon the Lord in these words: "O Lord, have mercy on my poor soul, and shed an eye of pity on thy poor servant, begging for mercy for her never-dying spirit. O Lord of life and glory, turn not thy ear from me in this hour of my great trial. O God, thou knowest my heart—thou knowest my heart is broken within me. O, my heavenly Father, I have sinned against thee—blot out my iniquities. For the Redeemer's sake have mercy, have mercy, have ——" The last moment had arrived, and she was swung off, (for in those days they had no drop;) but not half the multitude were aware of it, so intently were they gazing down the road towards the city, still hoping to see her brother appear.

* * * * *

A solemn, awful stillness followed, and was unbrokenly preserved for fifteen minutes; not a whisper was lisped; every eye ran over; every mouth was dumb, save stifled moanings, and every foot riveted.——A stir was suddenly discovered, and a simultaneous moan issued from the multitude—a deep, heart-penetrating moan. They saw the signal in the distance—it waved—again, it waved—they all waved—and in a few minutes William was seen coming at full speed, holding a paper as high up as his arm could reach. The Sheriff cut the rope immediately—but the vital spark had become extinct—entirely gone. William got there just twenty-three minutes too late.

* * * * *

After rendering all the tender offices in any man's power, to the remains of his beloved sister, William retired from the bustle of life, and desiring to live no longer in painful intercourse with his fellow men, he went into the Conewaga Mountains, and, selecting one of its wildest and most secluded parts, spent the remainder of his days in a cell, solitary and alone. He occupied his time in dressing grind-stones, which he hewed out from the massy rocks around him, and which he traded with a merchant, Mr. Wolfersberger, of Campbellstown, a few miles off, who supplied him with the necessaries of life. He lived to a very advanced age, and died in the year 1819.

* * * * *

Such is the sad, unvarnished tale of Elizabeth Wilson. I have adhered, literally, so far as my excellent opportunities to obtain correct information have afforded me access to the facts in the case, not varying or embellishing a single point, save one passage of no moment in the early part of my sketch. Had my design been to pen a fiction, the narrative would have afforded me abundant matter to run it into a nouvellete, by filling up the parts supplied by asteriks with dialogue and disquisitions on ethical subjects. From so sad a recital, my readers cannot fail to draw some very salutary lessons. One or two, certainly, must impress themselves upon every reflecting mind. 1st. The sin and the evil consequences resulting from disobedience to parents. Had Elizabeth heeded her parents' advice and good instruction, had she appreciated their prayers and earnest solicitude for her temporal and eternal welfare, she would have been preserved from her infamy and an ignominious end. All her sufferings, and all her ignominy, arose, unquestionably, from disobedience to parental advice and parental authority. 2d. The next great lesson is, the evil attendant upon resisting the strivings of the Spirit of God. For five years, at the earnest strivings of the Spirit, doubtless in answer to the wrestling prayers of her devout parents, she resisted the Spirit of Grace to her own destruction. 3d. The narrative instructs us, in fearful lines, that earth is not the theatre of retributive justice. The innocent victim, here, is ofttimes made to suffer for the crime of the vicious and debased, while the polished villain and the hardened wretch escape unpunished.

The truthful Goldsmith shadowed forth more than a poetic feeling, yea, a profound philosophical and religious truth, in the following stanza:—

> "When lovely woman stoops to folly,
> And finds, too late, that men betray,
> What charm can soothe her melancholy?
> What art can wash her guilt away?
> The only art her guilt to cover,
> To hide her shame from every eye,
> To give repentance to her lover,
> And wring his bosom—is to die."

In consonance with this sentiment, and in the greatest kindness, Providence, doubtless, permitted all the untoward events in the premises, for Elizabeth's best good, after she diligently sought His face sorrowing. Mysterious as are the dealings of Him who cannot err, and mysterious as they may appear to some persons in this instance, yet, unquestionably, the Lord suffered all matters pertaining to the above sad lesson, after the counsel of his own will, and after the highest wisdom. Had Elizabeth been saved, she would only have been saved to remorse and confusion of face; which she could never have surmounted. She would have become a by-word and reproach in every community, wherever she might go; but, having yielded to the Lord's behest—to give Him her heart—alas! too late for her earthly good, but not too late for his mercy and pardon; and having been ripened for a higher and a better state of existence, He, in mercy, saved her from suffering continually here below, and introduced her into regions of unalloyed bliss, where neither taunt, nor reproach, nor sorrow, is ever known.

BORDENTOWN, N. J., Nov. 20, 1853.

THE POPE'S BULL.

This name, which is now applied exclusively to instruments issuing out of the Roman Chancery, is derived from the seals which were appended to them, being formerly of gold bullion. Bulls were not originally confined to the Popes alone, but were also issued by emperors, princes, bishops, and great men, who, till the thirteenth century, sometimes affixed seals of metal, as well as of wax, to edicts, charters, and other instruments, though they were equally called Bulls, whether they were sealed with one or the other. The popes continue to the present day to affix metal or lead seals to their bulls, and only when they wish to bestow any particular marks of grace and favor on sovereigns or princes, are seals of bullion or gold affixed. The bull of Pope Clement VII., conferring the title of Defender of the Faith on Henry VIII., had a seal of gold affixed to it. Bulls containing matter of grace and favor were suspended by strings of red and yellow silk; but denunciatory and punitive bulls were hung by hempen cords.

A GOOD REPLY.—A Sunday-School teacher, instructing his class on that portion of the Lord's prayer, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," said to them, "You have told me, my dear children, what is to be done, the will of God; and where it is to be done, on earth; and how it is to be done, as it is done in heaven. How do you think the angels and the happy spirits do the will of God in heaven, as they are to be our pattern?" The first child replied, "They do it immediately;" the second, "They do it diligently;" the third, "They do it always;" the fourth, "They do it with all their hearts;" the fifth, "They do it altogether." Here a pause ensued, and no child appeared to have an answer; but after some time, a little girl arose, and said, "Why, sir, they do it without asking any questions."

The best bred man is he who is possessed of dignified ease to reconcile him to all situations and society.

S. S. G. ON "TRACT DISTRIBUTION."

Two communications have appeared in the Recorder, animadverting upon our article of the 27th of October. The writer appears to be a good deal disturbed, because we have suggested, that the colporterage of ministers is not absolutely necessary to carry out the design of the resolution adopted at the late anniversary of the Tract Society. Number One sets forth his argument on this point, and Number Two furnishes an account of a lecture upon the Sabbath by Mr. Crandall. But what the latter has to do with the subject, we are at a loss to conceive, unless the writer supposes that our remarks had some covert allusion to Mr. C.—a supposition which is justified, neither by the paragraph excepted to, nor by any thing else that we have written. The account of Mr. C.'s lecture may be well enough, and, as an item of intelligence, we have no objection to it. But the use made of it by our correspondent is, to say the least, gratuitous. It was not necessary to set up a defense on Mr. C.'s behalf, for we had not assailed him.

We are not a little surprised at the misconstruction put upon our article by Bro. G. To him, it "seems either to oppose Sabbath Lectures, and to adopt in their stead colporterage and tract distribution." Surely, the brother did not read carefully. The very sentence which he has quoted as sustaining such a conclusion, contains a distinct admission that "sometimes a public argument is valuable." We do not ask, that Sabbath Lectures should be wholly suspended, and it requires no small share of captiousness to twist our language into any such meaning. All we ask is, that undue stress be not laid upon them. For it is a fact, that some of our people attach so much importance to this kind of labor, that they are ready to call a minister away from his more ordinary work, in order to send him round the country lecturing and disputing upon this one favorite topic, the Sabbath. This, in our opinion, is giving the subject too much prominence. It is magnifying its importance above the ordinary work of preaching the gospel, and tends to strengthen the impression, already too prevalent, that the great end of all our religion is to bring men to the observance of the seventh day. We do not want to see our ministers diverted from the work of daily caring for the souls committed to their charge; and, in order to carry out the design contemplated by the Tract Society, it is not necessary that they should be. And all that we intended by the remarks which have called forth our correspondent, was to show that there was no necessity for it—that the churches had all the requisite agency within themselves for fulfilling what the resolution of the Anniversary contemplated, notwithstanding the small number of ministers—that there were honest hearted, amiable brethren, who might engage in the work, and whose quiet, unobtrusive manner, accompanied with prayer to the God of Truth, would, in a majority of cases, serve a better purpose than open controversy, which too often engenders a state of feeling unsuited to calm investigation.

It is not that we are opposed to occasional lectures, even by ministers, that we have written as we have. But we wish to impress it upon our churches, that, whether ministers can be had for the purpose or not, the work can be done. Nay, more; we wish to impress it upon them, that argument is not all that is wanted. In some cases there has been too much of it. What is more needed is prayer. Some foolishly suppose, that they must continue to argue a point, as long as there is any form of opposition; as if mere logic would silence the cavils of an unwilling heart. But we are quite certain that, in thousands of instances, opposers gainsay the truth, not so much because they do not understand it, as because it interferes with their carnal desires; and, in the mere desire to invent some excuse for continuing in sin, they will hold on in argument, and show an opposition, which might better be met with 'Who art thou, O man, that repliest against God?' than with any prolonged discussion. There is needed, in all cases, just so much argument as is necessary to state the subject clearly. Any thing beyond this tends to draw the mind away from the contemplation of simply what God has spoken to that which is merely human. When God's truth has been once stated clearly and intelligibly, the next resort should be to prayer. For the work of converting men to the Sabbath is to be God's work, rather than ours; and if we do not learn to consider it so, and act accordingly, God will frown upon us, and men will mock, and we shall continue to be the same poor, insignificant, despised people, that we always have been.

It is because we are firm believers in the efficacy of prayer, and are satisfied that nothing short of God's power will suffice to render men obedient to the truth, that we can see in the quiet diligence of the colporter, accompanied with fervent supplications to Heaven, a more efficient agency, in the majority of cases, than in prolonged argumentative efforts. In so expressing ourselves, we take for granted, of course, that the Tracts themselves contain a sufficiently clear statement of the truth. If they do not, let them be revised, or their places supplied by others more judiciously written.

We do not see the force of the view presented by our correspondent, that what we have written "may with equal propriety be said against the preaching of the gospel." He that would take that method of preaching the gospel which stirs up angry opposition, when another method would answer quite as well, would display very little of the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove. If opposition must come—if there is no alternative—let it come; but certainly it is not to be courted, as the necessary means of doing good. Besides, we have a special command to go every where preaching the gospel, but we have no such command to go every where lecturing upon the Sabbath. If it be replied, that the Sabbath is a part of the gospel, and therefore included in the great commission, we admit that in an extended sense of the term gospel, as including not only the good news of salvation by the blood of Christ, but also all moral duties, it is a part of it. It must, therefore, receive a proportional share of the preacher's attention. But when, instead of presenting it in connection with other duties, and with the plan of salvation, we single it out as a topic to be presented by itself, we are not so restricted as to the method of doing it, but what we may take that which seems to us most expedient.

The design of our correspondent, evidently, is to make it appear, that the aversion created by Sabbath lecturing is of the same nature with that manifested towards the preaching of the gospel. But this is a view that needs to be scrutinized a little. The manner of the speaker often has as much to do in calling forth the opposition of his hearers, as the matter which he presents. In regard to the preaching of Paul, of Peter, and of the Apostles generally, we must suppose, in the absence of testimony to the contrary, that their manner was unexceptionable. Hence, the opposition of their hearers was simple hatred of the truth. Indeed, in regard to their manner, we have clear testimony, that it evinced a "longing after souls in the bowels of Jesus Christ," (Phil. 1: 8,) "meekness in instructing those that opposed themselves," (2 Tim. 2: 24,) "great heaviness and continued sorrow of heart" on their account, (Rom. 9: 2,) "gentleness, even as a nurse towards her children, willing to impart, not the gospel of God only, but also their own souls," (1 Thess. 2: 7, 8,) "enduring all things for the elect's sake," (2 Tim. 2: 10,) and "warning every one day and night with tears," (Acts 20: 31.)

A like manner of presenting the Sabbath question would, undoubtedly, be followed by great advantages; it would, certainly, take away all ground for supposing that the opposition made to it is any thing else but opposition to God's truth. And if there was any thing in the history of the past, or in the signs of the present, to justify the impression that the subject would be presented in this manner, we would say, Let Sabbath lectures be multiplied to almost any extent. But there is, probably, not one of us so entirely free from party feeling, and so completely emptied of all selfishness, that we can go about the country, and discuss this one subject day after day, and night after night, making it (in fact) our whole business, without falling so much into the spirit of mere sectarianism as greatly to prejudice the cause. For it seems to be a well established fact, that even Christians cannot engage in the defense of some one doctrinal peculiarity, and give their entire attention to it, without becoming so permeated and saturated therewith, as to have scarce any thing else to exhibit as the evidence of their piety; in which case they are properly chargeable with sectarianism, notwithstanding the point for which they contend is a part of God's revealed will. Witness our Baptist brethren, with many of whom the initiative ordinance of the gospel so fills the eye and heart, that their chief merit as Christians consists in being thorough-paced, zealous-hearted Baptists. Not that they are not very worthy people in other respects also, but the outgoings of their zeal are almost invariably in this one direction. We Sabbatarians are prone to the same failing with regard to our own denominational peculiarity; and there is no man among us so elevated above human infirmity, that he can devote his attention to this one subject, without falling into that sectarianism of manner which produces in his hearers a state of feeling highly unfavorable to candid investigation—a feeling which is more than mere opposition to the truth, such as is made by the wicked to the preaching of gospel; it is rather a feeling of disgust, which renders farther attempts at instruction useless.

Now be it understood, that we are not opposed to Sabbath lecturing. We have occasionally done something at it ourselves; and, if Providence so order, we shall do it again. But, we apprehend, it may be carried to an extreme. For, notwithstanding the vast importance of the Sabbatic Institution, it is not the all in all of religion. It is not in the keeping of it, that lost sinners find their redemption. And though it may be one part of our mission to announce, that the blessing of Israel's God will rest upon those who keep the Sabbath from polluting it, our great and leading duty is that which devolves upon all who have tasted that the Lord is gracious; namely, to preach redemption through the blood of Jesus.

Before closing, we want to say, that the entrance by Bro. G. of his "solemn protest against the unmerited opprobrium which aims at the champions of truth, the defenders of God's law, the soubriquet of bull-dog-fighter, disputer, &c.," is wholly gratuitous. Such epithets have not been applied in the columns of the Recorder; at least, not in its editorials, and we have no recollection of their being used by any of our correspondents.

One thing more. It never entered our mind, while we were penning our editorial of Oct. 27th, that Bro. G. himself had been a Sabbath lecturer.

"SUNDAY CORN."

The article from the Investigator, headed "Sunday Corn," deserves more attention. It is as follows:—

"My two acres of Sunday Corn, that I promised to raise for the purpose of buying Liberal Books with the proceeds of the sale, I have not harvested yet, but I think it will yield about seventy bushels per acre. It stands about twelve feet high, and all the work was done on Sunday. I don't see but what Nature or Providence has smiled upon my Sunday work, though the priests tell us that no labor performed on that day ever prospers; my two acres of corn tell another story."

God does not change the order of nature to prevent men by force from hating and disobeying him. That Sunday Corn man may also lift his head in proud blasphemy against God, and still be prospered in raising corn, under the blessing of Him who has declared that seed time and harvest shall continue till the end of all things. But every such blasphemer should know, that God as well as man will have a harvest season, when the good shall be gathered, and the bad thrown away, or burned up. Until his harvest is gathered, and is converted into "Liberal Books," and these have done their work, the full amount due the man is not manifest. It will probably be a much greater harvest than the man supposed he was bargaining for. The bragging was too soon. In all this he may be treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath, and find that he has presumed too much on the mercy of God, in using the products of His earth to curse His name.

Again, there can be no sin in the act of planting, cultivating, and harvesting corn on Sunday, because there is no law of religion forbidding it. Yet, if a man perform an act for the sake of defying the God of religion, though the act may not be sinful of itself, yet, in thus performing it, he becomes a sinner. It is not sinful to secularize Sunday, yet it becomes a sin for a man to secularize it who believes God requires it to be kept holy, for in so doing he shows his hostility to God's government. A remedy would be found for the "Sunday Corn" man, and all Sabbath breakers, in fearing God and keeping his commandments.

MAINE LAW—A LOGICAL ARGUMENT.

PROPOSITION.

The Legislature should rescind the present License Laws, and prohibit, by some suitable law, the sale of intoxicating liquors to any that will buy for the ordinary purpose of beverage.

PROOF.

Because 1. The daily or general use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage is suicidal.

Because 2. He who gains property by selling intoxicating liquors as a beverage to any who will buy, gains it by an unjust traffic.

Because 3. The Legislature has no constitutional right to pass a law licensing any to sell intoxicating liquors to any that will buy—such a law is unconstitutional.

If these propositions be true, the truth of the leading proposition will follow as a legitimate conclusion. That they are true, will appear by the following arguments:

First. The general use of whatever is poisonous, and only poisonous in its essential nature, is suicidal. The general use of intoxicating or alcoholic liquors as a beverage, is poisonous, and only poisonous, in its essential tendency. Therefore, the general use of intoxicating or alcoholic liquors as a beverage is suicidal.

Second. Whoever gains property by violating the rights of others, is engaged in an unjust traffic. He who gains property by trafficking in or selling intoxicating liquors as a beverage, is violating the rights of others. Therefore, he who does this is engaged in an unjust traffic.

Third. The civil legislature has no right to pass any act, the necessary and essential tendency of which is to defeat the objects of the constitution or government under which they act—such an act is plainly unconstitutional. An act licensing a man to sell intoxicating liquors to any one that will buy, tends necessarily and essentially to defeat the objects of the constitution, under which they act. Therefore the civil legislature has no right to pass an act licensing a man to sell intoxicating liquors to any that will buy—such an act is plainly unconstitutional.

The preceding "proposition" and "proof" have been published by Dr. Smith, President of Randolph Macon College, Va. He offers to discuss them upon strictly logical principles with any gentleman who doubts that they are strictly true, and demonstrate that they are strictly true, and that every voter should be guided by their authority. There can be but little difficulty in gaining the assent of most minds to their truthfulness. The voters of New York have so decided. They now await with confidence the enactment of a prohibitory law, by the Legislature just elected. If such a law shall be enacted by the Legislature, the people are bound, by the authority of the necessity and righteousness of the law, to see that it is faithfully executed, and no man has a personal right to resist its execution. The laws of the State protect its citizens against robbery, and punish the robber. By the same right, the Maine law should be executed. The law lays its hand upon the implements used for counterfeiting, and upon weapons in the hands of dangerous persons. By the same right it may seize and destroy by burning or drowning the alcoholic liquor kept and sold for the suicidal purposes for which it is used.

Furthermore, when there is a responsibility that requires active operations, there is guilt when that action is not taken. He who stands by and sees a murder committed, without resisting it, is deemed a partaker of the crime. So those citizens that shall remain quiet and unprotesting while the murderous traffic in ardent spirits is carried on in their midst, and men are slain by it, are verily guilty. The murderous list at a late Court in New York city numbered eighteen, and yet in the same city there are now ten thousand licensed and unlicensed murderers, who have not been indicted, and who will for a time go "unwhipped of justice," and unhung. A prohibitory liquor law must be hailed by every peace-loving citizen as the great harbinger of peace, and safeguard against murder. Where there is one man slain by hostile weapons in the hands of the murderer, there are one thousand slain by the licensed traffic in ardent spirits. O, thou great murderer, Rum! thy sentence of death shall be passed upon thee soon, and on the day of thy public execution, a universal shout of victory shall be thy death dirge.

WHAT IS "BABYLON?"

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In seeing an extract of a letter in the "Advent Review and Sabbath Herald," I am induced to ask a few questions. I will here give the "extract"—

"'Bro. M. L. Dean writes from Ulysses, Potter Co., Pa., Oct. 23d, 1823:—The church here has been greatly encouraged and strengthened, the summer past, by the labors of Bro. Wm. S. Ingraham. Six, at least, have left the Sevnth-day Baptist denomination, and are now 'looking for that blessed hope,' and the glorious appearing of the Saviour. Others are searching for the truth. The cause has been gradually gaining here, ever since Br'n Edson and Andrews first came with the third angel's message. 'The Lord has done great things for us, whereof we are glad.'"

Now it is well known, that our "Advent" friends teach that "Babylon" means the churches; and that the words, "Come out of her, my people," (Rev. 18: 4,) mean that we should come out from the churches of the different denominations. I would inquire, whether this is not a very great error?

That "mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth," (Rev. 17: 5,) cannot mean the Christian church in any of its forms. I will suggest a few reasons.

First—The woman had already sat upon five of the different "heads" or forms of government, before there was any Christian church. Rev. 17: 9, 10. "Five are fallen, (when John wrote,) one is, and the other is not yet come." These "seven mountains," "seven heads," or "seven kings," are understood to mean the seven different forms of government on which the "woman"—the earthly power of human government—had sat: 1. Kings; 2. Dictators; 3. Tribunes; 4. Decemviri; 5. Triumvirate. These were then all "fallen," "one is" (Imperial) when John wrote; this is the sixth; and the seventh, Papal, had not yet come. This "woman," then, being so much older than any Christian church, cannot mean the Church in any of its forms.

Second—"Babylon" cannot mean the Christian church, because that "in her was found the blood of saints, and of prophets, and of all that were slain upon the earth," (Rev. 18: 24,) and this cannot be all found in the Christian church.

Third— Babylon cannot mean the Christian church, because "the woman which thou sawest is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth," (Rev. 17: 18,) and the church did not then reign over the kings of the earth. The "great city" is "spiritually called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified." Rev. 11: 8.

Fourth—Babylon cannot mean the Christian church, because it is the staff of the wicked, "the sceptre of the rulers." Isa. 14: 5. "The hammer of the whole earth." Jer. 50: 23

"Mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth," therefore, cannot mean the Christian church in any of its forms; but it is the earthly power of human governments. And whether she sitteth upon many waters, (Rev. 17; 15, Jer. 21: 13,) or whether she sitteth upon a scarlet colored beast, (Rev. 17: 3,) or on seven mountains, (Rev. 17: 9,) or whether she sitteth in the temple of God, (2. Thess. 2: 4, Isa. 14: 13,) or whether she sitteth as a queen, (Rev. 18: 8, Isa. 47: 7, 8,) yet "her merchants are the great men of the earth," who trade most in the affairs of government, and she will make laws, sometimes, contrary to the laws of the Most High, although "power belongeth unto God."

If our advent friends will answer the above reasons, and show that "Babylon" means the Christian churches, then we are ready to hear the call, "Come out of her, my people."

BIBLES STAMPED IN FRANCE.—The stringent measures instigated by the priests to limit the sale of good books by hawkers has defeated itself in a curious manner in some of the most benighted districts of France:

"In those parts of France it has hitherto been practically impossible to disseminate Protestant Bibles, because the hawkers, who alone supply the majority of country people with books, knew very well that the sale of them would, under one pretext or another, entail the loss of their license. But now that a government stamp is affixed to every publication before it can be lawfully sold by the hawkers, they have nothing to fear so long as they sell nothing unstamped. The government mark is a conclusive certificate, and it being impossible for the government to stigmatize the Bible as a bad book, Protestant Bibles are now selling freely in priest-ridden Brittany, and many other places where such things were scarcely known."

OUR PALESTINE MISSION.

The Committee on Outfit, appointed to attend to the preparation and departure of the missionaries to Palestine, are in hopes of engaging passage for Bros. Jones and Saunders, with their families, by a vessel to sail from Boston in a few weeks for Jaffa direct. Yet, owing to the lateness of the season, few vessels are up for the ports of the Mediterranean, and some uncertainty exists as to the time, and it may be a week or two longer before the time will arrive when we will give the parting hand to our beloved representatives to the land of Israel. Should too much delay occur in securing a passage by a sailing vessel, it may be deemed expedient for them to proceed by steam to Liverpool, and thence by merchant vessel to Jaffa or some other port in the vicinity, which the Committee are informed leave Liverpool weekly.

In the mean time, active measures will be required to provide all that will be useful and necessary for the prosecution of the work which our people have undertaken. Many things yet remain to be done, and several weeks will necessarily elapse before the missionaries themselves will be ready. Those having contributions of goods or articles for the mission will inform either member of the Committee, that timely notice may be sent of the time and place of shipment.

REVIVALS.—Several of our exchanges give accounts of interesting revivals in different parts of the country.

The Southern Baptist says that in Savannah, Ga., nearly fifty young converts have been received into the First Baptist Church, and a "very great number into the Methodist Church."

At Ottawa, Ill., the Congregational Church has enjoyed a precious revival, and nearly all of the churches and denominations in the place are represented as interested in the work.

Rev. Mr. Dudley, of Danville, Vt., writes to the Vermont Chronicle, that an extensive and extending work of grace is there enjoyed; that a large number are rejoicing in hope, and others inquiring what they must do to be saved; the Academy shares largely in the work, and the attention of the town is more or less arrested.

The friends of New Hampton Institution will be rejoiced to hear that the first term of the school in its new location at Fairfax, has been blessed with a precious revival of religion. Several have been baptized, and others are indulging hopes. The work is also spreading into the towns and parishes adjoining.

MR. ROBERTS, THE MISSIONARY IN CHINA.—Attention has been directed to this gentleman by the assertion that the leader of the Chinese insurgents recognizes him as having been his teacher in religion. An exchange paper gives a brief sketch of Mr. Roberts and his mission:—

"He first went to China as a missionary on his own account, leaving, as he supposed, property in this country for his support. This property, if we rightly recollect, was in Mississippi, and in the revulsions of the times turned out to be of nominal value only. A missionary society, originated for the purpose in Kentucky, had, we believe, the charge of this property in its hands. After the failure of this scheme, Mr. Roberts was received as missionary of the American Baptist Missionary Union, and continued in this relation until about the time of the formation of the Southern Board, when he became a missionary of that body, and so continued until a year or two ago. He is not a man of culture, and has not been regarded as altogether a practicable man by his associates. Both Boards found it difficult to keep him within the traces. His eccentricities, however, have never detached him from his original friends in Kentucky."

SELLING NEWSPAPERS ON SUNDAY.—Judge Thompson delivered an opinion in the Philadelphia Court of Quarter Sessions, recently, in the matter of "the sale and crying of newspapers on Sunday." The Judge held that the mere carrying about and selling of newspapers on Sunday would not amount to a breach of the peace, but the "crying" of newspapers in the streets on Sunday would constitute such an offence.

JEWS IN NEW YORK.—It is estimated that there are about 30,000 Jews in New York. They own thirteen synagogues, one in Crosby street, one in Green street, two in Henry street, one in Wooster street, one in Norfolk, and one in Clinton street, two in Attorney street, two in Chrystie street, one in White street, one in the upper part of Broadway, besides two or three more places of private meeting.

TAXATION IN OLD TIMES.—To show how things were done sixty years ago in Massachusetts, a correspondent of the Watchman and Reflector furnishes the following extract from a letter addressed to the late Dr. Rippon of London, dated July 26, 1794:—

"There has been a Baptist church in Medfield, twenty miles from Boston, ever since the year 1776, and they have a minister now preaching with them, yet they were all taxed last year towards the support of the Congregational minister of the town. And on the 2d instant, one of the Baptist society there was seized for said tax and carried to Boston, and there imprisoned; but our two Baptist ministers in Boston sent a letter to the assessor of Medford about it, which they received the next Saturday night; and as their proceedings were contrary to law, the Congregational minister of Medfield was so much agitated that on Lord's day morning, the 6th inst., he sent two of their assessors to Boston, and they released the prisoner, without his paying any costs, and conveyed him home the next day. I was in Boston the week following, and was informed of the uneasiness of many in town and country at their violent conduct. This instance may give you some idea of the weakness of what they call the established religion in our government. If Christians in general would unite and renounce that tyranny, it would soon be at an end in America. But as the Man of Sin must die with the consumption, he hath a slow, lingering death, 2 Thess. 2: 3, 8. Perhaps his death will be more violent in Europe than in America."

MINISTERIAL PERQUISITES.—Under this head, a correspondent of the Independent says that while, for fifty or a hundred years past, there has been little or no increase of ministerial salaries, there has been a "great falling off in the item of ministerial perquisites. The following statement is introduced in proof:—

In looking over, lately, a manuscript record of the descendants of the celebrated John Eliot, the "Apostle to the Indians," I found the following paragraph, which may serve to throw a little light on the "shady side," as it appeared a century since. In speaking of Rev. Andrew Eliot, D. D., who was installed pastor of the new North Church in Boston, April, 1742, and died Sept. 13, 1778—the writer says: "It was the custom, some eighty or a hundred years ago, to give the minister rings, gloves, &c., at weddings, funerals and baptisms. I have lately come into possession of my grandfather Eliot's almanacs for forty or fifty years, in which he kept an account of such matters; and I find that in twenty-eight years of his ministry he received 2,940 pairs of gloves, of which he sold during twenty-one years to the amount of £1,441 18s. 1d. Old Tenor. During the same years he received 188 gold rings. In eight years he sold of these to the amount of £227 15s. Old Tenor. His presents during his ministry of thirty-six years amounted to over £8,000, Old Tenor."

FREE-WILL BAPTISTS.—The fifteenth General Conference of the Free-Will Baptist Church commenced at Fairport, N. Y., October 5th, and closed at about 11 o'clock, A. M., on the 18th. The principal topic of discussion was in reference to a Biblical school, which the denomination are determined to establish. The locality, however, is not yet decided upon, but it is in the hands of a committee. By the report on statistics, it appears that the Free-Will Baptists in this country number 50,180 communicants. During the past year there was an increase of over 3,000. There are 1,122 churches and over 1,000 preachers connected with the society. Their opposition to slavery is constant and uncompromising.

JEWS IN SINGAPORE.—A small Jewish congregation exists at Singapore. A correspondent of the Jewish Chronicle writes that a few months since, he visited their synagogue in that ancient city, and distant part of the world. He had the honor of being called to the reading of the Holy Law from a beautiful scroll, the rollers of which were of silver, very beautifully ornamented with filagree work. There was just sufficient to form a Minyan. He breakfasted and passed the Sabbath with the President, who showed him marked attention. They claimed to be descendants of the first Babylonish captivity, and are ignorant of the second dispersion. They embraced him as a brother, and were glad to find, although a European, he could converse with them in the Hebrew language.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.—A South Carolina paper—The Charleston Mercury—has the following sensible remarks in relation to the effects of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, sometimes called the "Bill of Abominations:"—

"The South has gained nothing but a loss by this law. It was a stupid blunder on the part of Southern statesmen. The value of the slave lost is eaten up if capture follows, while hatred to the institution abroad, and opposition to it at home, are increased by its hard features and the barbarous enforcement of them."

General Intelligence.

European News.

By the steamer Washington at New York, and the Canada at Boston, we have one week later news from Europe.

The Turks and Russians have had several skirmishes, in which the former appear to have come off victorious, with heavy losses to the latter. Accounts from Vienna state that the Turks had an engagement with the Russians, in which fourteen superior Russian officers fell, the Turks remaining masters of the field, and the Russians retreating to Bucharest. Four Russian officers arrived at Constantinople as prisoners of war. Accounts from Constantinople state that the Sultan had positively rejected all proposals which the diplomatists have submitted to him. It is rumored that the Czar has formed an alliance with Dost Mahomet, of Persia, to proclaim war against British India, if Great Britain persists in supporting Turkey. Austria remains neutral, but keeps a strict watch over the movements of Servia. The Servian Government in the mean time has ordered the population to arm, and has informed the Porte that neither Austria nor Russia will be permitted to occupy Servia. The Porte has decided that foreign refugees shall not be employed in Europe, but may serve in Asia.

The Paris Moniteur states that the French troops in Algiers have obtained a victory over the Arabs, on the 29th Oct. The enemy left 250 dead on the field, the French having captured all their standards, arms and horses, as well as 4,000 sheep and 390 camels. The French lost 8 men killed and 20 wounded.

From China it is announced that Shanghai has been occupied since Sept. 7 by a band of insurgents. At Amoy on the 12th Sept. the rebels completely routed a body of Government troops.

An iron fishing steamer of 100 tuns and 30 horse power, intended for the Deep Sea Fishing Association of Scotland, has been launched on the Clyde. The vessel is intended to carry boats with their crews, nets, lines, &c., to the fishing grounds, while she admits also of fishing from her decks and of trawling on a new system, besides being ever ready to afford shelter and assistance to the fishermen whenever a gale should spring up.

California News.

By way of New Orleans, we have California news to Nov. 1st, two weeks later.

The total amount of treasure shipped from San Francisco on the 1st November, by both routes, was $2,750,000, mostly for New York.

The miners generally were prosperous. Many new placers had been discovered.

Two steamers—the American Eagle and Stockton—had exploded, killing two persons.

The most absorbing questions in California are the proposed removal of the capital, and the election of a United States Senator, to take his seat in 1855.

From the Sandwich Islands the news is ten days later. Another change has been made in the Ministry, Prince Kamehameha having resigned the office of Prime Minister, and John Young being appointed his successor.

The fine building known as the San Francisco Hotel, had been entirely consumed by fire.

A serious riot is reported to have occurred at a place called Martinez, in which three Spaniards were killed.

Trade in San Francisco, and indeed throughout California, is represented as exceedingly dull, owing to the immense stock of goods on hand, and all articles except flour have met with a further decline. Flour, however, is quoted as being firmly held. The crops were turning out fine.

Thanksgiving.—This festival was observed in New York with more than usual strictness. Most of the churches were open for service, and several of the institutions established for the benefit of the poor gave Thanksgiving Dinners. At the dinner of the Ladies' Home Mission Society at the Five Points Mission House, addresses were delivered by Joseph Hoxie, Father Gavazzi, and others, and about $300 was contributed in cash. At the Home for the Friendless there was a Donation Visit, which brought in some $600 in cash, besides gifts of provisions, clothes, and fancy articles for sale.

Speaking of Thanksgiving calls to mind the following paragraph from Rev. Mr. Powers' History of Coos County in New Hampshire, which is copied to show how Thanksgivings were kept in olden time:—

"Early in the settlement of Coos, it so happened that the annual Thanksgiving was passed before the intelligence of it arrived there; but soon after, a Dr. White came up to visit his friends at Newbury, and brought with him a proclamation. This proclamation was read publicly on the Sabbath by Mr. Powers, and by him it was proposed that they should keep a Thanksgiving, notwithstanding the time specified by the Governor was passed, and he proposed the next Thursday. Upon this, a member arose and gravely proposed that it might be deferred longer—'for,' said he, 'there is not a drop of molasses in the town, and we know how important it is to have molasses to keep Thanksgiving. My boys have gone to No. 4, and will be back, probably, by the beginning of next week, and they will bring molasses; and it had better be put off till next week Thursday.' It was unanimously agreed to; but the molasses not coming, it was deferred another week; and finally, Thanksgiving was kept without molasses. This, which is enough to provoke a smile, will nevertheless show us the simplicity and destitution of those days."

Pockets Full of Saint Peter.—Father Gavazzi is witty as well as eloquent. In a speech in New York, he related the means used by the Catholics to silence and murder him:—

The participants in the Canada riot came into the church, not only against me, but against women, against children, against unarmed citizens. The riots were not aimed against me only, but against liberty of discussion. Romanists and Jesuits, if you wish to meet me; if you do not like my doctrine; if you dispute my historical facts; do not answer me with stones and guns, but answer me by facts; answer me reasonably, like men, and not like brutes and savages! Stones are not so soft and logical as syllogisms, my dear brethren! (Laughter and applause.) They are strong arguments, it is true, but not very persuasive! At the door of the church in Montreal, men were stationed with clubs for the use of the rioters, and in addition, the pockets of the miscreants were filled with stones. These are the primary volumes of the Canada schools! The important passage of Matthew, said to allude to Peter, 'On this rock will I build my church,' has been made rather clear to me since my Canadian tour. I can now really believe, without much difficulty, that the Roman Catholic Church is built upon this rock, after having witnessed Roman Catholics coming into church with their pockets full of Saint Peter! (Great laughter and applause.) Without wrong or ridicule, I might say: 'Upon this rock is their church built.' Yes, it is a material church, without spiritual elements.

Important Arrest and Recovery of Money.

A few weeks since, a bag, containing $37,810 in bank bills, was mysteriously stolen from the counter of the Bank of the State of New York, just before the hour of closing. The police have since been on the alert to ferret out the expert thief, and at various times it was thought that a clue had been obtained. The arrest of two men, at Toledo, Ohio, with $2,000 of bills corresponding with those stolen, in their possession, created some stir, but it was reserved for our City Police to discover the true rogue, and recover the money. It appears that on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 26, Officer Keefe, of the Chiefs Office, was in a public house in Broadway, where he met a suspicious character known as Chauncey Johnson, for whom he had for some time been looking, and suspecting that he knew something of the robbery, the officer took him aside, and charged him directly with it. Johnson, who no doubt had heard of the arrests at Toledo, thinking the officer was possessed of all the facts, became alarmed, and offered Mr. Keefe $2,000 to allow him to escape. The officer pretended to accept the bribe, and the fellow then told him that he was in possession of all the money, and said that it was at his room in Commerce-st. The two then proceeded in that direction, but the officer, on learning the number of the house, arrested the rogue, and lodged him in the Fifteenth Ward Police Station. He then proceeded to search the room of his prisoner, and found about $33,000 of the stolen money wrapped in an old flannel shirt. Johnson was then removed to the Chief's Office. This same individual was arrested in July last for stealing a box containing $700 from behind the counter of Lovejoy's Hotel, but on trial he was acquitted in consequence of the absence of the principal witness for the prosecution. He is a young man, of rather a sporting appearance, and has lived most of his days in this City. The two men who were arrested in Toledo, are supposed to have been accomplices of Johnson's, and had taken the $2,000 West to circulate. The balance of the stolen money has probably been gambled away by Johnson. The $5,000 reward offered by the Bank for the recovery of the stolen money, will probably be awarded to the officer who made the important arrest.

A Monster Ship.

Donald McKay, of Boston, has just completed the largest sailing ship in the world. She is called the Great Republic, is clipper built, and has about 6000 tuns of storage capacity. She is 325 feet long, has 53 feet extreme breadth of beam, and 39 feet depth of hold, including four complete decks. The hight between her spar and upper decks is 7 feet, and between the others 8 feet; and all her accommodations are in the upper between decks. The crew's quarters are forward, and aft she has sail-rooms, store-rooms, accommodations for boys and petty officers, and abaft these two cabins and a vestibule. The after cabin is beautifully wainscoted with mahogany, has recess sofas on each side, ottomans, marble-covered tables, mirrors, and eliptical panels ornamented with pictures. She has also a fine library for the use of her crew, and spacious accommodations for passengers.

On the spar deck there are five houses for various purposes, but, such is her vast size, they appear to occupy but little space. She has an eagle's head forward for a head, and on the stern, which is semi-eliptical in form, is a large eagle, with the American shield in his talons. She is yellow metaled up to twenty-five feet draught, and above it is painted black. Instead of bulwarks, the outline of her spar-deck is protected by a rail on turned stanchions, which, with the houses, are painted white. She is built of oak, is diagonally cross-braced with iron, double ceiled, has four depths of midship keelsons, each depth fifteen inches square, three depths of sister keelsons, and four bilge keelsons, two of them riders, and all her frames are coaged, also the keelsons and waterways, and she is square-fastened throughout. She has three tiers of stanchions, which extend from the hold to the third deck, and are kneed in the most substantial style. She also has many long pointers and ten beamed hooks fore and aft. In a word, she is the strongest ship ever built.

Her model is very beautiful, her ends are very long and very sharp, and her lines slightly concave forward and aft. The gripe of her forefoot, instead of being angular, is arched, and rises about 18 inches from a straight line. Viewed either end or broadside on, she is the most beautiful vessel we could wish to see. She has four masts, the after one fore-and-aft rigged, and named the spanker mast; the others are termed as usual, and have Forbes' rig. The lower masts, commencing with the fore, are 130, 131, 122, and 100 feet long, and the lower yards 110, 115, and 90 feet square, and the other spars in like proportions. She carries nothing higher than royals forward or aft, and is very snug and strongly rigged. She has on board a steam engine of 15 horse power, designed to do all the heavy work, such as taking in or discharging cargo, setting up rigging, hoisting topsails, pumping ship, &c.

A few years since, Mr. E. C. Swift, of West Topsham, owned the stage from Montpelier to Bradford. He found himself in serious pecuniary embarrassment, and started for California. After trying his luck in the mines with indifferent success, he finally took up his old business of staging. A short time since he returned with a pile amounting to some $20,000, called all his creditors together at Wait's River House in Topsham, paid them off, principal and interest, and threw in a good dinner.

SUMMARY.

Officer James L. Metcalf, of the Crystal Palace Police, the other day arrested a man named C. E. Weidemeyer, who has occupied the position of one of the Directors in the German Department, and on searching his residence, No. 378 Fourth-st., a large stock of goods were found, which had been purloined from the French, German, and other departments, from time to time. The goods stolen were multifarious in their character, and embraced jewelry, shawls, silks, cloths, china, plate, &c. Among other stolen property found at the rogue's house was a superb Sevres vase, the property at Napoleon IIId, and a beautiful breakfast service sent to the Exhibition by the Czar of all the Russias.

The completion of the interior of the main building of the Smithsonian Institution is now actively progressing. The original plan having been changed by the Regents, all the wood work and framing has been removed, and its place is being supplied by fire proof materials. The first story is to be fitted up for the Library and Museum of Natural History, and the second story as a Lecture Room, capable of accommodating 2,000 persons. These arrangements it is thought will be completed within six months at the farthest, when the western wing of the building, at present occupied by the Library, will be converted into a Gallery of Art.

From the Directory of Chicago for 1853, we collate a few facts of general interest. The number of names upon the list is nearly 13,000, which is considered to represent a population of 55,000. The volume informs us that we have 120 physicians, and 170 lawyers. There are 42 church edifices, and 23 hotels, within the city limits. Our Fire Department consists of 12 companies, numbering 600 efficient members. There are published in the city 24 periodicals, of which 7 are dailies, and 16 weeklies, 1 of each in German, and 4 monthlies.

Col. Thorne, of Washington Hollow, Dutchess County, N. Y., lately imported a valuable Durham bull, and other stock, by the steamer Herman, which were selected, without regard to cost, of the best to be found in England. The bull is stated to have cost five thousand dollars. By the Washington, on her last trip, he received a cow, of the same strain as the bull, for which, we are told, he paid $3,000, besides the expense of her passage. This is probably the highest priced cow ever imported. She was accompanied by a two months old calf, which cost $750. Also, a lot of South Down sheep, of superior quality.

Speaking of the inducements to build a railroad to the Pacific, an exchange says that it would make the United States at once masters of the Commerce of Asia. From England to China is 9,658 miles and 120 days by the overland route; 18,500 miles and 170 days' sail by the Cape of Good Hope; 12,000 miles and 130 days' sail or 63 days' steam by the Isthmus of Panama; while a route across this continent would bring Liverpool within 37 days of Shanghae, and reduce the cost of transportation more than one-half.

John Walker, a brewer at Cincinnati, recently deceased, left an estate of $260,000. By will he devised to his wife in cash $10,000, and her dowry of one-third in real estate, for her natural life. She claims, as they were childless, she being a second wife, that she, as next of kin, is entitled to the whole of the personal estate, beside her dower in the reality. The nineteen heirs of Walker claim that if Mrs. Walker elects to not take by the will, she relinquishes the $10,000 legacy, and all the personal property, and can only take her dower in the reality. The case is in the court.

A new discovery has been made relative to deaf persons. Two artists in London have invented an instrument which is placed within the ears without projecting, and being of the same color as the skin, is not perceptible. In enables deaf persons to enjoy general conversation, to hear distinctly at church and public assemblies; the unpleasant sensation of singing noises in the ear is entirely removed, and it affords all the assistance that could be desired.

The N. Y. Tribune of Nov. 26th says:—Gerrit Smith is in this city at present, under menical treatment. His disease is the one popularly called rush of blood to the head, which is thought by physicians to be a revulsion caused by a severe but successful surgical operation to which he submitted several months ago. His physicians, we are informed, cherish the hope that he will be relieved in season to take his seat at the opening of Congress.

The Ohio State Journal says: The Capitol of the State of Tennessee, now near completion, is said to be one of the finest buildings in the world. Its cost is a million of dollars. It is built of solid limestone taken from near the hill on which it stands. The roof is of Tennessee copper, and the speaker's stand of marble quarried in that State.

While the City Marshal of Bangor, Me., was engaged in destroying a quantity of liquor that had been seized, some one in the crowd inquired, "Why was not this solid for three hundred pence and given to the poor?" A voice in the distance replied, "The poor have enough of it; let it go!"

Miscellaneous.

I Owe no Man a Dollar.

Oh, do not envy, my own dear wife,
The wealth of our next door neighbor,
But bid me still to be stout of heart,
And cheerfully follow my labor.
You must know, the last of those little debts
That have been our lingering sorrow
Is paid this night! So we'll both go forth
And shake hands with the world to-morrow!
Oh, the creditor is but a shame-faced dog
With the debtor's name on his collar,
While I'm a king and you are a queen,
For we owe no man a dollar!

Our neighbor you saw in his coach to-day,
With his wife and his flaunting daughter,
While we sat down at our coverless board,
To a crust and a cup of water.
I saw that a tear-drop stood in your eye,
Though you tried your best to conceal it;
I knew that the contrast reached your heart,
And you could not help but feel it;
But knowing now that our scanty fare
Has freed my neck from the collar,
You'll join my laugh, and help me shout
That I owe no man a dollar!

This neighbor whose show has dazzled your eyes,
In fact is a wretched debtor;
I pity him oft, from my very heart,
And I wish that his lot were better;
Why, the man is the variest slave alive;
For his dashing wife and daughter
Will live in style, though ruin should come—
So he goes like a lamb to the slaughter!
But he feels it the tighter every day—
That terrible debtor's collar!
Oh, what would he give could he say with us,
That he owed no man a dollar!

You seem amazed—but I'll tell you more;
Within two hours I met him,
Sneaking away with a frightened air,
As if a fiend had beset him;
Yet he fled from a very worthy man,
Whom I met with the greatest pleasure—
Whom I called by name, and forced to stop,
Though he said he was not at leisure.
He held my last note! so I held him fast!
Till he freed my neck from the collar;
Then I shook his hand as I proudly said
"Now I owe no man a dollar!"

Ah! now you smile, for you feel the force
Of the truths I've been repeating;
I knew that a downright honest heart
In that gentle breast was beating!
To morrow I'll rise with a giant's strength
To follow my daily labor;
But ere we sleep let us humbly pray
For our wretched next door neighbor;
And we'll pray for the time when all shall be free
From the weight of the debtor's collar—
When the poorest will lift his voice and cry,
"Now I owe no man a dollar."

Sunday Sports in France.

A letter to the N. Y. Tribune, dated Tuesday, Nov. 1, gives the following account of doings on the previous Sunday:—

The most brilliant assemblage of the season took place last Sunday at the favorite resort near Ville d'Avray. The Emperor, Empress and suite, the Grand Duchess of Baden and suite, a majority of the chiefs and subordinates of the Departments of State, the nobility and gentry, the members of the jockey club, and a large number of English gentlemen, who had come over expressly for the occasion, crowded the field of sport. Not less than two thousand carriages were on the ground, a large proportion of which were what are called here "Americaines," while there were a considerable number of the heavy, but stylish, English coaches-and-four, used as family traveling wagons. The price of admission to the field being placed so high, and the distance from Paris so great, the assemblage was what the Club desired it to be—entirely select, as far as regards personal appearance, at least. So exclusive an assemblage of brilliant liveries and elegant toilettes of both sexes, would be difficult to meet in any country. It was gratifying to see but few American ladies on the ground; the gentlemen, however, turned out very strong. The most noted actresses, dancers, singers, and other celebrities of Paris, were present, exciting envy and surprise by the magnificence of their toilettes.

The Emperor and Empress came on the field in an open calèche, drawn by four horses, with four similar carriages following, containing their suite, but without military escort. They stepped out of their carriage into the crowd, and passing through a narrow opening that was made for them spontaneously by the people, without the aid of policemen, they passed to the imperial stand, in front of which six soldiers were drawn up to present arms, while another gave the imperial rap, tap, tap, on the drum. As the Emperor passed along, recognizing here and there an acquaintance, the people took off their hats as they do on meeting a friend; but there was no cheering; the bourgeois never shout "Vive l'Empereur"—they leave that to hired chiffoniers. The Emperor has again that sallow, bloated appearance, which he wore more than a year ago, and from which he had partly recovered; he begins to stoop, and when he walks bears heavily on his stick, as if he required its support to sustain himself. Schemers against the life of Louis Napoleon have no need to jeopardize their lives in attempts upon his; for nature will have accomplished its work upon his body before many years roll around. It is exceedingly rare to see a man with his peculiar dead appearance of the skin, and with such manifest indications of imperfect secretion, hold on life as tenaciously as he does. It is still more rare to see a man recover from this condition.

After the imperial party had gained the stand prepared for them, the horses were called for a start. In the circle which was to be run, there were 17 obstacles to be leaped; stone-hedges, hurdles, dry ditches, and a river 16 feet wide, 5 feet deep, dug square down, and hid at its edge by shrubbery, so that the horses could not see it till they arrived at the point to make the leap. The course lay around an ordinary farm, slightly undulating, with meadow, table-land, marsh, and thickets of bushes and forest trees, very happily interspersed, so as to make the chase approximate as near as possible a veritable fox or deer-chase. Flag-staffs erected at the different objects to be leaped, indicated the track to be pursued.

The horses were all English, but owned in France. Their owners, titled gentlemen, were to ride each his own horse. The first race was to be twice around the track, two miles and a half; eight horses started. At the river they all jumped nearly together, and all escaped without accident except the Count Talon's fine horse, Honey Dew, who fell and broke a hind leg, near the stifle joint. He was afterward shot. The rider escaped without serious injury. At a garden fence, another horse fell and was "done for;" two others bolted at the hurdles, and only four came in on the "home stretch."

For the second race seven horses started, and three came in running; two had fallen, and the others bolted. On the third race, four horses started; when the signal was given, one horse bolted up the hill, and was no more seen; another fell, and two came in on the home stretch at a sweeping rate, leaping the obstacles as if there had been nothing in the way.

These races produce the greatest excitement imaginable; for, besides the usual interest taken in a horse-race, there is added to it the expectation, in fact, the almost certainty, that a serious accident of some kind will happen. And what gives still further interest, is the fact that the riders are generally the owners, and are not only titled persons, but men of respectability, of family, and of wealth, and engage in the chase more for excitement than for money. Viewed from the stands, these races are extremely picturesque; it is rare to see the same horse keep the lead for any considerable distance, on account of the nature of the ground, and the more or less derangements which take place at the obstacles. At each obstacle there is a crowd gathered, where each cheers his favorite horse. Sometimes the horses are lost for a moment in a cluster of trees, and then again they are seen scampering across a level stretch of meadow, with tremendous strides, till they reach a fence, where perhaps some fall and others bolt, while the better-trained horses, leaping with ease and precision all the obstacles placed in their way, arrive at last at the piece of level ground where the trial of speed takes place, and which terminates at the judges' stand. Here the poor beast receives the lash, and the money excitement runs up to zero. I have seen more than one Frenchman, men of respectability, of dignity, and great propriety, under other circumstances, rush on to the track, and, indifferent to the jeers and convulsive laughter of the less interested spectators, jump up into the air every time his favorite horse had to leap an obstacle, let him down again easy and safely, (in his motions,) laugh, swear, exhort, sea-saw the air with his arms, and, finally, when his favorite came sweeping past him in the lead, go into an ecstacy of abandoned delirium that is refreshing to look at.

The Way to Get an Office.

The following has come to us through a source that entitles it to entire credit:—

A huge two-fisted, broad-shouldered son of North Carolina, appeared a few days ago, in the treasury building, and inquired for the Secretary. He was directed to the proper door, but when about to enter the ante-room, was stopped by the messenger, for not observing the usual ceremonies.

"What's the matter now?" asked Rip Van Winkle.

"You can't go in, Sir," replied the messenger.

"We'll see about that," replied Rip, as he gathered the messenger in his brawny arms, and set him aside. Arrived at Mr. Guthrie's room, and finding several gentlemen present, he asked:—

"Which is the Secretary?"

"I am," said Mr. Guthrie to the intruder, rather sternly. "How did you get in here?"

"Oh! we'll talk about that after awhile," said Rip. "I've come on business, and we'll attend to that first. You see, Mr. Secretary, there's a light boat at ——, and a Whig has it now, and I want it. Mind now! It won't make any difference in my voting if you don't give it to me. I always vote right, anyhow. Here's my papers; look at 'em, and speak out."

Mr. Guthrie was quite taken with his honest simplicity, and replied that he would answer him at twelve.

"Mind now," said Rip, showing his watch to the Secretary; "you see that little finger? Well, when it gets to 12 I'll be here certain. No mistake now!"

"Where are you stopping?" inquired the Secretary.

"Stopping? You will say that. I've got no money to fool away stopping anywhere. I got my breakfast at the market-house this morning. And you see I want to start home in the mail boat this evening, for if I stay here long, I can't get home at all. Now mind, Mr. Secretary, 12 o'clock, you know!"

During his absence Mr. Guthrie examined his papers, and finding him properly recommended, directed his commission to be prepared accordingly. Punctual to the minute, our friend appeared, and was handed his commission. He warmly thanked the Secretary, and took his leave, and now is doubtless at home attending to his duties. We dare say that Uncle Sam has not a better officer.

The Wine-Crop of the West.

From the Cincinnati Columbian.

We have deferred, for some time, an article upon the grape interests of our State and the West generally. We wish we could do the subject greater justice than the limits of an editorial column give us opportunity; for the grape culture, the grape and wine interests of our community are fraught with very considerable importance now, and must, eventually, become a great and absorbing feature of the State's property. Fields of waving corn, or golden tasseled wheat, are fair to the view, but picture to yourself the vast vineyards that shall anon deck the hill and dale with gorgeous and tempting voluptuously, rich, red, ripe, Isabellas or Catawbas.

The third year after planting the slips, the production of wine may be commenced from the fruit. There is more expense and labor in commencing the cultivation of the vines, than is probably attendant upon the planting of the usual crops, but less afterward. From one acre, well planted with healthy vines, probably from $600 to $1,000 worth of wine may be produced in good seasons. This wine has generally brought $1 per gallon here, but this year will probably bring 25 cents more.

Notwithstanding the immense annual increase of the quantity of wine manufactured in the West, the price continues to improve, and it must do so as the wine becomes more generally known. This year, notwithstanding the increase of wine made in this neighborhood, the price has raised nearly twenty-five per cent., and the demand for wine is much greater than last year. So must this demand continue increasing.

The crop this season has been very fruitful, surpassing, in fact, any former yield known in the West; the wine will be very pure and demand great.

In Ohio there are about 1,500 acres of land exclusively devoted to grape growing, between 300 and 400 of which are near Cincinnati. Within twenty miles of this city, including a part of Kentucky, on the opposite side of the river, there are 1,300 acres, and double that quantity of vines. More have been planted this year than there were last. In Missouri, near Hermann, there are 500 acres; in Indiana, 200 or 300; in Illinois about 100, and in Kentucky the same—making about 2,500 acres in all. It is estimated that Indiana, Ohio and Kentucky will this year produce at least half a million gallons of wine. The yield on some of the vineyards will be equal to 7,000 or 8,000 gallons—allowing 2,400 vines to the acre, planted about three feet apart, in rows separated by a distance of three feet. Mr. Robert Buchanan, who is among the most successful cultivators of the vine, this year obtains about 800 gallons of wine from each acre of his vineyard, which will net him about $700 per acre. Some other vineyards will do equally well. Persons, however, are not advised to embark in grape-growing with the expectation of profit, if it shall be necessary to hire labor. The German vine-dressers muster all capable members of their family into the service—the wife often being the most efficient. In this manner they realize an adequate income.

It has been customary to give a piece of land, of say fifteen to twenty acres, with a house on it, to these Germans, on the condition that the tenant shall plant a certain quantity of grapes each year, in a proper manner, and pay the proprietor one half the proceeds of the vineyard.

The fruit is purchased from the vineyard men for from $5 to $6 per 100 pounds, (or two bushels) a yielded from 3½ to 4 gallons of wine. It is then mashed by the manufacturers in the city, and pressed. The juice is then fermented in the cellars, and the sparkling Catawba is in prime order for market at the end of fifteen or twenty months.

A few days ago we visited the wine-vaults of Mr. Longworth, and the following facts were derived: There are three vaults, one of which will turn out 50,000 bottles every year, and another 100,000 bottles yearly, of dry wine. Some portion of the cellars is occupied by immense butts, or cylindrical tanks, one of which holds 5,000 gallons, or $5,000 worth of wine, if bottled. The staves are about three inches in thickness, and the heads curve inward, so as to introduce the arch, to resist the internal pressure. Other objects, quite as noticeable, are the long rows of black bottles placed in a horizontal position, and stacked up like cord-wood, in solid piles as high as one's neck. In the cellars of the extensive native wine establishment of Longworth and Zimmerman are twenty-four casks holding about 2,500 gallons each, or 60,000 gallons altogether, of the vintage of 1850, '51, '52; and it is expected to store 25,000 gallons of this year's wine.

Mr. Longworth will this year have on hand and for sale about 200,000 bottles sparkling Catawba; Messrs. Longworth and Zimmerman, some 60,000 bottles dry Catawba, exclusive of a quantity of wine sufficient for 190,000 bottles; Messrs. Bogen, Corneu & Son, Work, and others, from 90,000 to 100,000 bottles sparkling Catawba.

Extraordinary Operation on the Subclavian Vein, by the Mate of a Vessel.

The following narrative is given with three objects: Firstly, to show the value of self-control and common sense, in scenes of danger; secondly, the resources of nature under the most desperate circumstances; and, thirdly, to correct the boastful surgeon, when he feels inclined to convince the world that all that is excellent and skilful centers in himself. The merest chance in the world elicited the simple and child-like narrative from the operator, and he seemed as much astonished as ourself, when the almost certain character of his performance was pointed out to him on a preparation of the heart and blood-vessel.

Edward T. Hinckley, of Wareham, Mass., then mate of the bark Andrews, commanced by James L. Nye, of Sandwich, Mass., sailed some two years and a half since (we find the date omitted in our minutes) from New Bedford, Mass, on a whaling voyage. When off the Gallipagos Islands, one of the hands, who had shown a mutinous disposition, attacked Captain Nye with some violence, in consequence of a reproof given him for disobedience. In the scuffle which ensued, a wound was inflicted with a knife commencing at the angle of the jaw, and dividing the skin and superficial tissues of the left side of the neck, down to the middle of the clavicle, under which the point of the knife went. It was done in broad day, in presence of the greater part of the crew; and Mr. Hinckley, the mate, being so near, that he was at that moment rushing to the captain's assistance. Instantly seizing the villain, and handing him over to the crew, the knife either fell or was drawn by some one present, and a frightful gush of dark blood welled up from the wound, as the captain fell upon the deck. Mr. Hinckley immediately thrust his fingers into the wound, and endeavored to catch the bleeding vessel; with thumb against the clavicle, as a point of action, and gripping, as he expressed it to me, "all between," he found the bleeding nearly cease. The whole affair was so sudden, that Mr. Hinckley stated to me, he was completely at a loss what step to take. Such had been the violence of the hemorrhage, a space on the deck fully as large as a barrel head, being covered with blood in a few seconds, that it was evident from that and the consequent faintness, that the captain would instantly die, should he remove his fingers from the bleeding vessel. As Mr. H. said to me, with the simplicity and straightforward style of a seamen, "'I brought to' for a minute, to think over the matter. The bleeding coming upwards from under the collar-bone, and being completely concealed by it, it was plain enough that I couldn't get at the blood-vessel, without sawing the bone in two; and this I would not like to have tried, even if I had dared to remove my fingers. Feeling that my fingers' ends were so deep as to be below the bone, and yet the bleeding having stopped, I passed them a little further downwards; still keeping up the pressure against the bone with the middle joints. I then found my fingers passed under something running in the same course with the bone; this I slowly endeavored to draw up out of the wound, so as to see if it was not the blood-vessel. Finding it moved a little, I slowly pulled it up with one finger; when I was pulling it up, the captain groaned terribly, but I went on, because I knew I could do nothing else. As soon as I could see it, I washed away the blood, and was astonished and very glad to see there were two vessels, as I supposed them to be, one behind the other; the cut was in the front one. It was the full breadth of the knife, or about half an inch, and neither across nor lengthways, but about between the two, and went about half its thickness through the blood-vessel; it was smooth and blue in appearance, and the cut had stopped bleeding, as I supposed at the time, because the vessel was pressed together by being stretched across my finger. As I had often sewed up cuts in the flesh, and knew nothing about tying blood vessels, and supposed that was only done when they were cut in two, as in amputated limbs, I concluded to try my hand at sewing it up; so I took five little stitches; they were very near together, for the wound was certainly not half an inch wide, if so much." On inquiry of Mr. Hinckley, if he cut off the thread each time and threaded the needle again, he said Yes; but "I only cut off one end, and left the other hanging out." This he had learned from a little book, prepared for the use of sea captains and others, when no surgeon was on board. Mr. H. continued: "I twisted the ends together loosely so as to make one large one, and let it hang out of the wound over the bone; then I closed all up with stitches and plasters. On the fourteenth day I found the strings loose in the wound, from which matter had freely come; it healed up like any other cut." Poor Captain Nye finally met a sad fate; he was drowned on the destruction of his boat by an enraged whale.

The practical anatomist and surgeon will at once see the internal evidence of the entire truthfulness of this extraordinary narrative, and the certainty that Mr. Hinckley must have closed up a wound in the subclavian vein. Aside from the position of the wound rendering any other explanation immpossible, and the color and amount of blood instantly lost, the fact that a wound of the subclavian artery must have been followed by aneurism, if not instant death, renders the conviction unavoidable that it must have been the vein. When the Captain "groaned terribly," as Mr. Hinckly was drawing up the vessel with his finger, the brachial plexus of nerves was evidently put on the stretch. Indeed, it is impossible to suppose, aside from Mr. Hinckley's high character and the corroboration of the log book, that such a story could have been devised by any but a surgeon of decided practical ability. We may be mistaken in our views of its importance, but we think that in the estimation of our professional readers we have placed upon record one of the most extraordinary circumstances in the whole history of Surgery.

Production of Oxygen Gas.

M. Boussingault has lately described a process by which pure oxygen gas may be obtained from the atmosphere at a trifling cost, so as to enable it to be collected in unlimited quantities, and preserved in gasometers, like coal-gas, for application to many practical uses in the arts. This process depends upon a peculiar property possessed by the earth barytes, of absorbing the atmospheric oxygen at one temperature and evolving it at another; or rather, the ready conversion of hydrate of barytes into peroxide of barium, by a current of atmyspheric air at a dull red heat, and the decomposition of the peroxide, by steam, at a lower temperature, even at 212 deg. F., with re-formation of the hydrate of barytes—the process being in reality a continuous one.

It is found in practice advisable to mix the barytes with hydrate or magnesia, so as to prevent the fusing of the first; this mixture, when placed in an earthern tube heated to dull redness, is to be oxidised by passing a current of dry atmospheric air over it. So soon as the oxidation is completed, the tube is connected with the gas-holder, and a jet of steam allowed to act upon it; this reconverts the per oxide of barium into hydrate of barytes, the excess of oxygen being given off and collected in the gas-holder. The barytes is then again oxidised by a fresh current of air, and deoxidised by steam, as frequently as required, thus making the process continuous. Mons. Boussingault considers that about 1,000 cubic feet of pure oxygen gas could be obtained every twenty-four hours, by the use of 10 cwts. of barytes, which will answer this purpose for any length of time. The Marrow Squash.

Much depends upon the manner of planting squash seeds, as well as other seeds, to ensure good crops. Every man's motto should be, 'work the soil deep,' and with the blessing of God, I shall have vegetables to sell and to keep. When I have planted my squash seeds after the following rule, I have never failed of being well paid for my labor, viz:—Dig the holes 16 or 18 inches deep, three feet broad and seven feet apart; throw the top soil on one side, and the bottom soil on the other side of the holes. After digging as many holes as I wish to plant hills, I return the top soil to the bottom of the holes, and then take one bushel or more of well pulverized manure, one peck leached ashes, for each hill, and with a spade or shovel mix well together from top to bottom. Then plant the seeds, leaving the top of the hills level with the surface of the ground, and keep them so during the season. When they are up, and the bugs have done troubling them, thin them out, leaving two or three stocks in each hill, which will cover the ground before the summer is ended. [New England Farmer.

Long lived People.

Let me now be permitted to delineate the portrait of a man destined to long life. He has a proper and well-proportioned stature, without, however, being too tall. He is rather of the middle size, and somewhat thickset. His complexion is not too florid; at any rate, too much ruddiness in youth is seldom a sign of longevity. His hair approaches rather to the fair than the black; his skin is strong, but not rough. His head is not too big; he has large veins at the extremities, and his shoulders are rather round than flat. His neck is not too long, his abdomen does not project; and his hands are large but not too deeply cleft. His foot is rather thick than long; and his legs are firm and round. He has also a broad arched chest; a strong voice, and the faculty of retaining his breath for a long time without difficulty. In general there is a complete harmony in all parts. His senses are good, but not too delicate; his pulse is slow and regular.

His stomach is excellent, his appetite good, and his digestion easy. The joys of the table are to him of importance; they turn his mind to serenity, and his soul partakes in the pleasure which they communicate. He does not eat merely for the sake of eating; but each meal is an hour of daily festivity; a kind of delight attended with this advantage, in regard to others, that it does not make him any poorer, but richer. He eats slowly, and has not too much thirst. Too great thirst is always a sign of rapid self-consumption.

In general, he is serene, loquacious, active, susceptible of joy, love, and hope; but insensible to the impressions of hatred, anger, and avarice. His passions never become too violent or destructive. If he ever gives way to anger, he experiences a useful glow of warmth, an artificial and gentle fever, without an overflowing of the bile. He is fond also of employment, particularly calm meditation and agreeable speculation; is an optimist, a friend to nature and domestic felicity, has no thirst after honor or riches, and banishes all thoughts of to-morrow. Improvement in Making Butter.

M. Chamembel proposes to introduce a modification in the process of making butter, by which the latter will be improved in quality and rendered capable of being longer kept in a fresh state. If butter contained only the fat or oily part of milk, it would but slowly undergo changes from contact with the air; but it retains a certain quantity of caseine, which, transformed by fermentation, given rise to butyric acid, to which rancid butter owes its disagreeable taste. Washing does not effectually remove this cause of alteration, for water cannot act upon butter, nor can it separate the caseine which becomes insoluble under the influence of acids developed in cream. A more complete purification may, however, be affected if we saturate or neutralize these acids; the caseine will then be rendered soluble, and consequently the butter will only retain in it very small quantities, in a state which it may be almost entirely removed by washing. M. Chamembell proposes to operate as follows:—When the cream is put in the churn, pour in little by little, and working the churn at the same time, a quantity of milk of lime, sufficient to destroy all acidity; churn till the butter separates, but not till it forms into lumps, as is usually done; strain off the buttermilk, and put cold water in its stead along with the butter in the churn; continue churning till the butter is sufficiently collected, then take it out and make it up in lumps or rolls in the usual way. The butter which has been made according to this method has always proved better and kept much longer fresh than that obtained by the usual mode of proceeding. The buttermilk was free from all acrid taste, and was much relished by those persons who used it, and by animals. It had also lost its laxative properties.

Washing with lime water has also restored butter previously so tainted that it could not be used except for melting. Any other alkaline wash may be substituted for lime water. [Comptes Rendus.

Preparing Poultry for Market.—In answer to the question, "How shall I dress and pack my turkeys, geese, ducks, and chickens, to send to New York market?" the N. Y. Tribune says: Hang your turkeys up by the heels, and cut the jugular vein. Pick them dry. Remove the intestines and wipe inside dry. If you use water at all, do it by holding the bird by the legs and letting an assistant pour the water through them. Wipe and hang them up in a cool place twelve hours, or till thoroughly dry. Serve geese, ducks and chickens the same way. Do not scald them, unless you would like to have them spoiled. Take a box that will hold 250 chickens close packed. Put only 200 in it. The remainder of the space fill with Rye straw—clean rye straw—no chaff. Do not use wheat straw, or oat straw, if you can avoid it. You may use coarse, clean, marsh hay. A wisp of straw in each bird will be advantageous. Nail up your box tight and hoop strong and mark plainly what is in it, and to whom it is sent. Send only in cold weather.

Croton Water-Works in Europe.—One of our exchanges says that the corner stone of the Berlin Water-Works was laid on October 21st. Four hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants will thus be accommodated with the pure element. Mr. Schramke, a German draughtsman, formerly engaged on the Croton Water-Works, returned to Berlin, in 1844, examined the face of the country about the town, and found a series of small lakes, some twelve miles north of it, of such an elevation as could supply a reservoir about sixty feet high on a hill immediately outside the walls. The reservoir will be capable of throwing water into the third or fourth story of every house in Berlin, as that city is on a sandy plain. Every facility exists for constructing these water-works, as the country to be passed through is exceedingly level, and being sandy, is easily dug.

Coal in Indiana.—There are in Indiana 7,700 square miles of coal beds. In Great Britain a single square mile of coal area produces annually about 2,670 tuns of coal. Her whole coal area exceeds Indiana's but 4,100 square miles, yet her annual production is 31,500,000 tuns. The coal beds of Indiana, worked with an energy competing with hers, are capable of approximating her productions within 11,000,000 tuns, yielding yearly 20,075,150 tuns of the mineral; exceeding the present annual product of the whole United States some 16,000,000 of tuns, and approaching very nearly one half of the total product of the world; for the mines of the Union yield but about 5,000,000, and the mines of the world but about 50,000,000 of tuns annually.

Honest Policy.—A gentleman one day conversing with a watch-maker upon the dishonest practices of persons in his way of business, was thus addressed by him:—"Sir, I served my apprenticeship with a man who did not fear God, and who consequently was not very scrupulous in the charges which he made to his customers. He used frequently to call me a fool, and tell me I should die in a work-house, when, in his absence, I used to make such charges as appeared to be fair and honest. In course of time I set up in business for myself, and have been so successful as never to have wanted a shilling; whilst my master, who used to reproach me for my honesty, became so reduced in circumstances as to apply to me for a couple of guineas, and did at length himself die in a work-house."

A Short Voyage Around the Globe.—The iron screw steamer Argo, recently arrived at Southampton, Eng., has been round the globe in 128 days. She was 64 days on her passage from Southampton to Melbourne, via the Cape of Good Hope; and occupied the same length of time, in returning via Cape Horn. She is comeletely ship rigged, and has an auxiliary steam power of 300 horse, to be used in adverse winds and calms. She has used 2,105 tuns of coal, about 17 tons a day, and has averaged 230 miles a day, or about 9½ miles an hour during the entire voyage. In fair winds under canvass, the Argo made 13 and 14 knots an hour for successive days; and 11 and 12 knots, close hauled, with the screw feathered.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address,

VISIT TO THE CHINESE INSURGENTS.

In June last, the Rev. Charles Taylor, a Methodist missionary at Shanghae, visited the camp of the Chinese Insurgents at Chin-Kiang-fu—a city which he had visited in disguise about one year before. Of what he saw on the way and there, he gives some account in two letters to the N. Y. Tribune, extracts from which we print herewith.

On the way he visited Silver Island, of which he says:—

It is a hill rising from the bed of the river, is covered with a rank growth of trees and shrubbery, and overlooks the City of Chin-kiang-fu, which is only two miles distant. There are many temples on this island, some of them exceedingly beautiful and costly, but the insurgents have utterly demolished every idol. So gratifying a scene of devastation I certainly never before beheld. Here were gilded and painted fragments of images strown about in every direction, while the clay and straw of which the larger idols had been made covered the floors to the depth of one or two feet. The altars and tables, incense vases and candlesticks, Buddhist books, and all the paraphernalia of idolatrous worship, were broken, torn, and scattered here and there, in irrecoverable ruin; and, this, too, by the very ones who, not three years ago, were willing votaries at just such shrines. The images of stone were thrown down from their pedestals and had their heads knocked off. But I found one about two feet high, in a sitting posture, richly gilt and very heavy, whose head had successfully resisted the hammers of the iconoclasts. It was lying with its face on the earth, and the enraged expression of its features seemed to show a strong resentment at the indignity thus cast upon it. With the help of two of my boatmen, a pole and a rope, I brought away this chap, and he now sits in sullen silence near me, while I relate the story of his wrongs. I also brought away many pieces of wooden gilded idols—heads, hands, feet, thumbs, fingers, and the like. This was by the cheerful permission of the twelve or fifteen priests, who were all that remained on the island out of a hundred, the majority having fled in their boats to the main land, on the approach of the insurgents. To these poor, forlorn bonzes I gave many books and tracts, besides a small sum of money, for they seemed quite destitute, and with the aid of a Christian native whom I had brought with me, exhorted them not to grieve over the destruction of these senseless blocks, and showed unto them "a more excellent way." We had got them together in an apartment of one of the temples for this purpose, and it was most interesting to observe the attention with which they seemed to drink in the good news of salvation through Jesus Christ. No time, place, or circumstance, could have been more opportune for the exhibition of Christian truth. For, just as all their sandy foundation had been swept away, and the strangest possible evidence of the utter inability of their idols to save or help even themselves, lay spread around, we pointed them to a Rock on which they might build and be entirely secure. These tidings came to them as a life-boat to a wreck. Here were the miserable fragments of their shattered craft, to which they were clinging with the forlornness of despair. But their faces lightened with hope when the good, staunch ship of Christianity hove in sight, and sent a boat to save them.

At Silver Island Mr. Taylor was obliged to leave his boatmen, and go on foot to Chin-Kiang-fu, which place he reached after much difficulty, when he found himself among the "long-haired men," who crowded around him in great numbers, eager to learn who he was, where he came from, and what he wanted. He says:—

To these inquiries I replied, that I was from Shanghae, that I was an American, and my name was Taylor. With reference to my business there, I requested to be, conducted to their highest officer in that city—Chin-Kiang-fu—to whom I would make known my object in visiting them. Being very anxious to have me tell them at once, they showed me the way into a well-furnished hall, and had tea brought for me, having first desired me to be seated in one of the many cushioned chairs ranged along in two rows facing each other, up and down the middle of the large apartment. Alternating with the chairs were what we call here teapoys—they are small square or oblong stands for holding cups of tea and refreshments. While I was sitting here sipping my tea, and the object of strange interest to these wild looking men and boys, who had never before seen a foreigner, one who seemed to be a subordinate officer, came, and seating himself by my side, again asked for what I had come. Fearing if I should tell him, that having once satisfied their own curiosity, they would not take me to the commandant, I resolutely refused to answer any questions on that subject, till I was conducted to his presence. Seeing my determination they furnished me with a guide and an escort of two or three soldiers, all armed with long spears and swords. Our path lay about on a narrow ridge within the stockades, which were being taken down and replaced by a substantial brick wall, three or four feet thick, furnished with parapets and port-holes, through which cannon of various caliber were poking their ugly noses. The soldier-artisans were working like bees on the unfinished portions—some bringing brick, some laying them, and some making mortar. My guides were frequently asked, as we passed along, who was that stranger, and their invariably answer was, Yang shoong dee; i. e., "Foreign brother"—a term of civility and affection never before applied to foreigners in China.

We soon came to the north-eastern gate of the city. It had been completely filled up with heavy stone masonry, and the only access was by a narrow flight of stone steps to the top of the wall. Through a narrow door in the parapet we entered, and here were again surrounded by multitudes of astonished spectators, who stared at me till their eyes seemed ready to leap at me from their sockets, like so many bullets. Their curiosity being a little abated by the answer of my escort—for many of them spoke dialects which I did not understand—we proceeded on through the stone-paved streets, now entirely deserted, but which, when I was here a year ago, disguised as a native, were teeming with a busy, thriving population. The inhabitants had all fled at the approach of the patriot forces, leaving their shops and dwellings, and most of their furniture, goods, utensils and effects of various kinds. The buildings were for the most part left standing, but without doors and shutters—these all having been taken, as before stated, to assist in the construction of stockades on the hill, and along the river bank fronting the city. Tables, chairs, trunks, boxes, bedsteads, cooking utensils, etc., lay strewn about in the houses or piled up together in confused masses, with straw, ashes, bits of paper, and rubbish of every conceivable description. The contrast with the appearance of things here a year ago was truly painful, and I could but breathe a prayer that the former inhabitants of this once populous city might be restored to their homes again, in the possession of Christianity and its blessings to such an extent as to far more than compensate for their present losses and forlornness. As we passed along, I saw several very aged men and women, who were probably too old and infirm to flee, and perhaps, considering they had not long to live, at any rate, thought they might as well die then, as to drag out a few more days of miserable, homeless existence. But, probably quite contrary to their expectations, their lives were not only spared, but they were furnished with food and allowed to retain their dwellings and property. Still, the poor creatures looked the pictures of sorrow, and my heart yearned over them as their sun seemed likely to set in clouds and darkness. O might even their dim eyes be permitted to see the dawning of a brighter day than has ever yet shone on the "flowery land," and might their ears—but stay, have they not already caught some of the notes of praise to the one only living and true God? For morning and evening ascends from that beleaguered city the doxology:—

> "Praise the True God, who is the Imperial Supreme Ruler;
> Praise Jesus the Saviour of the world;
> Praise the Holy Divine Influence—the Holy Spirit—
> Praise these three, who compose one True God."

Indeed, these were the first sounds that saluted my ears when I entered the garrison, for it was about sunrise, and they were engaged in their morning devotions. What words to hear in the heart of the most populous pagan empire on the globe, and that, too, from lips that five years ago were repeating the senseless mummeries of idolatrous superstition!

We soon reached some spacious premises, that had lately been the residence of the chief mandarin of the city and surrounding country, but was now the headquarters of Lo ta-yun, the commandant of the patriot forces of this place. My escort led the way through five successive buildings and as many open courts, all in a line from the street, from which the innermost of all, the sixth, is visible. The buildings had large yellow curtains flaunting in the breeze, on each side of the passage through them. Having reached the interior building, which was in fact the dwelling, the others being occupied by attendants, soldiers and servants, I was here directed to a seat in the large reception hall, which was quite similar in its general features to the one into which I had been ushered on my first appearance in the garrison. It had ornamental lanterns of fantastic shape, and rich embroidered hangings suspended from the roof and about the sides of the apartment. The courtyard in front of this was filled with rare and beautiful flowers and plants in unique pots of every size and shape. I soon inquired for Lo-ta-yun, and on being asked why I wished to see him, I replied that I should tell no one but himself in person. There was here as before a crowd of curious spectators, who examined my hat and dress and hands, with much the same interest with which you would look at a strange animal in a menagerie of some heretofore unheard-of species.

Before many minutes a man of middle stature, apparently about 45, came out from an adjoining room and took a seat near me. He was stoutly built, had a well-formed head, and a piercing black eye, that looked out from under a pair of prominent, overarching brows. One of the attendants, who afterward acted the part of interpreter for me, as he was a kind of secretary to the commandant, told me this was Lo-ta-yun. There was no appearance of an officer in his manner or dress. He had on a short blue silk jacket, and dark brown loose trousers. I had formed such an idea of the princely appearance of Lo, whose reputation for military sagacity and skill had spread his name widely abroad, that I did not believe this was the man, and frankly expressed my doubts, refusing at the same time to reply to his interrogatories, and requested again to see the highest officer in the city, for I was resolved not to be thwarted in my design to get an interview with Lo himself, if it was in the power of perseverance to compass it.

I have since wondered at his forbearance with my pertinacity, when he knew I was so completely in his hands. He could have had my head taken off at a word, and never have been called to account for the act. I could scarcely credit his repeated assurances that he was the man whom I sought to see, and it was not until his attendants attired him in his official uniform, and he took his seat in the large chair at a table in the middle of the hall, and began to issue his orders to his attendants, that my doubts were quite removed. I then informed him fully of myself, my occupation, and my object in visiting his camp. At the same time I opened my carpet-bag, and laid its contents on his table. The books were the four Gospels and Acts, the book of Genesis, and many other tracts and books on the Christian religion. He appeared quite pleased in looking at them, and said the doctrines he believed were the same with ours.

Notice of my arrival had been sent to the second officer in command, and he soon came in a large handsome sedan, borne by four coolies, and with quite a train of soldiers and attendants going before and following. He came in, and a seat was placed for him at the right of Lo. The uniform of the two was nearly alike, being a yellow silk or satin cap covering the whole head and extending in a sort of cape half way down the back, leaving only the face exposed. It had a binding of red satin all around the edge an inch and a half wide, and looked in shape somewhat like the representations of the caps or helmets of Egyptian heroes, or of the human heads on the monsters of Layard's Nineveh. Next was a long richly figured satin gown, reaching to the ancles, and over this a red figured satin waistcoat, or jacket-like garment, with sleeves conveniently loose and short. You know they eschew shaving the head, that being one of the abominations introduced by the "fiendish Tartars." So they have their long hair all twisted or braided up, and fastened on the top of the head by a piece of yellow silk, answering the purpose of a turban without being as full; the common soldiers wear red silk on the head.

Breakfast was soon announced, and I was conducted into an adjoining room, to a square table, with seats for two at each side. I was politely invited to sit down first, and then seven others, the secretaries and officers of Lo, also took their seats. I had heard the insurgents were in the habit of saying grace before eating, and I wanted to see how this would be done, but presently one of them took his chopsticks and requested me to do the same, for, as a mark of civility, they would not eat till I had begun. I mentioned to them what information we foreigners had received about their practice of asking a blessing, and they immediately replied it was true, and that it had just been done in the room from which we came. I then recollected that after I had left that apartment I heard human voices chanting, with the usual Chinese musical instruments accompanying, and learned that this was a form of grace before meat. I thereupon informed them that it was our custom to ask a blessing at the table, and if they had no objections I would do so at that time. They very cheerfully assented, and after I had finished they seemed quite gratified, saying that the spirit and design of the thing was the same, though the manner of performing it was different. At every meal after this, during my stay, all at the table waited for me to ask a blessing. All the members and dependents of Lo's household assembled in the large hall morning and evening, when he or one of his secretaries read a portion either from the book of Genesis—that being the only part of the Bible yet discovered among them—or from some of the religious tracts written by Fai-ping-wong himself. After reading, during which all present sit and listen attentively, they all join in chaunting a hymn, always closing with the doxology above translated. Then each one takes the cushion from his chair, and putting it down before him on the brick or tile floor, kneels on it in a very solemn manner, with his eyes closed, while Lo himself, or the secretary, prays audibly, the rest remaining perfectly silent. It was the most impressive scene I ever witnessed, from the reflections and associations to which it gave rise, and which I must leave for the imagination of your readers to supply. The only drawback to its solemnity to my mind—but none in theirs—was the accompaniment to the chaunting, consisting of all the discordant sounds of gongs, drums, cymbols, horns, and various other instruments, but ill suited, in our estimation, to produce that devotional feeling so important in Christian worship. In the middle of the room in which we ate was a table, placed on which were twelve bowls—three each of rice, of meat, of vegetables, and of tea. On inquiring the meaning of this, I was told it was designed as an offering to the Supreme Ruler—one of each kind respectively for the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. After being allowed to remain thus for some time, they were removed, but whether eaten or not by others I did not learn. The fact of their presenting offerings of this kind is proof presumptive that they have as yet no knowledge of the New Testament—a need which I supplied as far as practicable on that visit, with what effect time only can reveal.

My boatmen had so thoroughly imbibed the dread of the "long-haired men"—so industriously cherished by the accounts of their cruelty, which the Imperialist mandarins circulate in their proclamations far and wide—that no assurances of safety I could give them would induce them to go any nearer the city. So, to accomplish my objects, I was under the necessity of making three several visits on foot to my boat—two miles distant, in doing which it was unavoidable to pass the Imperialist lines, not very far from their camp, as their tents lay spread out on the hills to my left, and within gun-shot of the river bank, along which my path lay. The second time I took as many more copies of the books as I could well carry, and the third time I took the medicines and a small case of surgical instruments, which I had brought with me from Shanghai. The demand for medical aid was greater than I had the means of supplying, but I afforded relief to the many applicants as far as within my power. A successful surgical operation on one poor fellow's eye excited much interest and gratification.

I took my final leave of Lo-ta-yun at night, and he, after having hospitably entertained me during my stay, gave me three live fowls and two hams, for my food on the way back to Shanghai. He also had my carpet-bag filled with the books that had been published by the order of Fai-ping-wong, and with the royal proclamations he had issued. Lo also wrote a friendly letter to his "foreign brethren" at this place, which was translated and so widely published that you have doubtless seen it long before this. These were all given to a servant, who followed me to the outer gate of his head quarters, where was a horse saddled and bridled waiting for me, with several Lieutenants and several hundred men, each one having a lantern and armed with swords, matchlocks, and the long spear whose polished blades gleamed in the light of the torches and lanterns. With this imposing procession I was escorted through many winding streets, and at length through the west gate of the city to the bank of the river, where was a boat waiting to convey me down to my own. Three brave fellows, armed cap a pie, got in with me. One of them was the chief of the men from Kwei-chow, a district in Kwang-si province, and he boasted of his native tribe, the Miau tsz, having never been subject to the Tartar rule, and having never adopted their customs of shaving the head, &c. We were proceeding slowly down the river, near the shore, and had not yet passed beyond the stockades, when we were hailed by a sentinel. My long-haired friend replied that he and two comrades were just going down the river a little way to accompany the "foreign brother" to his boat; but so strict were the orders of this sentry, and so faithful was he to them, that he said we must come to land and allow him to see for himself, or he should fire into us. My companions protested that he must know who they were, but all to no avail—to the shore we had to go, and undergo an examination by the trusty sentinel, who came up with his lantern as we landed, and when he had the evidence of his eyes to corroborate that of his ears, he was satisfied, and we passed on a few hundred yards, till we had got beyond all those difficult obstructions in the path enumerated in my last letter. Then I insisted on being put ashore, and walking to my boat; for I would not allow these brave, noble fellows, to risk their lives on my account, as I knew there were Imperialist scouts out night and day. We parted with many expressions of good feeling and urgent requests on their part that I would soon visit them again.

My boatmen were no less rejoiced than surprised to see me come back with my head on my shoulders. We then weighed anchor, and in a few minutes more were on our return to Shanghai, which we reached safely after three days' sail down the Yang-tsz-Kiang.

Yours, truly, CHARLES TAYLOR.

WHEN WE ARE DEAD

There will be some honest sorrow. A few will be really sad, as we are robed for the grave. Fewer, probably, than we now suppose. We are vain enough to think our departure will produce considerable sensation. But we over estimate it. Out of a very small circle, how soon we shall be forgotten! A single leaf in a boundless forest has fallen! That is all.

> The gay will laugh.
> When thou art gone, the solemn brood of care
> Plod on, and each one as before will share
> His favorite phantom.

The world will go on without us. We may have thought [illegible] very important [illegible] great machinery will be ungeared when we are gone. But the world goes clattering on as if nothing had happened. If we filled important stations in society, if we have wondered what would or could be done, if we were removed; yet how soon others will fill our stations! The world can be a bustling, active world, without us. It was so before we entered it. It will be when we are gone.

When we are dead, affection may erect a monument. But the hand that sets it up will soon be as powerless as ours, and for the same cause. How soon they that wept over us will follow us! The monument itself will crumble, and its dust will fall on the dust that covers us. If the marble or the granite long endures, yet the eyes of affection will not endure to read the graven letters. Men will give a hasty glance at the name of one they never knew, and pass on, with not a thought of the slumberer below.

> On my grassy grave
> The men of future times will careless tread,
> And read my name upon the sculptured stone;
> Nor will the sound, familiar to their ears,
> Recall my vanished memory.

When we are dead, our influence will not be dead also. We leave epitaphs upon indestructible materials. Our manner of life has been writing them. We have stirred up thought and awakened emotion. The wonderful machinery of mind has felt our presence. We have pressed the stamp of our character into the wax of moral sensibilities around us. Footsteps towards immortality have been well guided or misdirected by us. Our places of business, or social resort, may know us no more; but living, accountable beings feel the influence that survives our personal departure.

When we are dead, the kingdom of God will not die. It did not depend on us for existence. And onward will it go, when we have ceased to live. Happy, indeed, if it had been the honor and joy of our labors to have promoted it. Blessed is it to be remembered as having loved Zion, as taking pleasure in her stones, and favoring the dust thereof.

Sacred, consoling thought! The kingdom of Christ moves on, when we drop all our earthly relations to it. Other servants of God will rise to fill our places. A brighter star may rise for the one that has fallen. Stronger hands than ours may come into the ranks.

When we are dead, some will think of us. Perhaps not a large circle. And what will they think? Our present course of life is furnishing them with themes of thought. Coldness and indifference to the kingdom and glory of God—of that will our survivors think, if it marked our characters. And in sadness will those that truly loved us ponder it. And thoughts, how many, and how comforting, will rise, amid the pangs of real sorrow over our departure, if we had shown forth the praises of Him who called us to glory and virtue. Into which of these channels are we likely to turn the thoughts of men? [Puritan Recorder.

It never rains in Peru. The vapors, as they ascend from the sea, are attached to the summits of the Cordilleras, where they are condensed into showers. But on the line of coast, which lies between the sea and the base of these stupendous mountains, the rain never falls. All agriculture is the result of artificial irrigation. But the frequent and full streams, flowing from the Cordilleras, make this comparatively easy.

THE GRAVE.

BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

There is a calm for those who weep
A rest for weary pilgrims found;
They softly lie, and sweetly sleep,
Low in the ground.

The storm that wrecks the winter sky,
No more disturbs their deep repose,
Than summer evening's latest sigh,
That shuts the rose.

I long to lay this painful head
And aching heart beneath the soil;
To slumber in that dreamless bed
From all my toil.

The grave, that never spoke before,
Hath found at length a tongue to chide;
Oh, listen! I will speak no more:
Be silent, pride!

Art thou a mourner?—hast thou known
The joy of innocent delights,
Endearing days forever flown,
And tranquil nights?

Oh, live! and deeply cherish still
The sweet remembrance of the past;
Rely on Heaven's unchanging will
For peace at last.

Though long of winds and waves the sport,
Condemned in wretchedness to roam,
Live! thou shalt reach a sheltering port,
A quiet home.

Seek the true treasure, seldom found,
Of power the fiercest griefs to calm,
And soothe the bosom's depest wound
With heavenly balm.

Whate'er thy lot, where'er thou be,
Confess thy folly, kiss the rod;
And in thy chastening sorrows see
The hand of God.

A bruised reed he will not break;
Afflictions all his children feel:
He wounds them for his mercy's sake;
He wounds to heal!

Humbled beneath his mighty hand,
Prostrate, his providence adore;
'Tis done! arise! he bids thee stand,
To fall no more.

Now, traveler to the vale of tears,
To realms of everlasting light,
Through time's dark wilderness of years,
Pursue thy flight.

There is a calm for those who weep,
A rest for weary pilgrims found;
And while the smouldering ashes sleep
Low in the ground,

The soul, of origin divine,
God's glorious image freed from clay,
In heaven's eternal sphere shall shine,
A star of day!

The sun is but a spark of fire,
A transient meteor in the sky!
The soul, immortal as its Sire,
Shall never die!

HE COULD PRAY!

Yes! far better than he could talk. The person alluded to was quite awkward in his efforts at conversation, while we would offer a beautiful and appropriate prayer. It was almost painful to see what hard work it evidently was for him to talk. [illegible] Not that he was a person of weak mind or low character. On the contrary, good sound sense was conspicuous in all that he really did say, and his conduct was above reproach. He was a man, too, of refined feeling and delicate sensibilities, and of fervent religious emotions, and you could not know him long without loving him. Yet it would make you ache to hear him talk. The truth is, he was an inveterate stammerer. But that man could pray. I found it out on this wise. It fell in my way to stay at his house for the night. I was a stranger to the place, a stranger to him. I soon learned that he was a warm-hearted Christian, notwithstanding the difficulty he found in communicating his ideas. A prayer meeting had been appointed at his house on that very evening. I was so strongly importuned to conduct it, that I could not refuse; but after some opening exercises threw it back upon the brethren present, to be carried on as they should see fit. Toward the close of our very precious interview, I was surprised and somewhat troubled to see our stammering brother drop on his knees for prayer. I supposed his painful attempts to express himself would excite the attention and sympathy of those present, and mar the good effect of the previous exercises. But imagine my astonishment when, without any apparent difficulty, or uncommon hesitancy, he poured forth a most beautiful and impressive address to the throne of grace, leading our hearts and thoughts directly to the mercy seat, and to the cross of Christ. I felt rebuked, and could only listen with silent admiration.

I afterward thought much of this circumstance. At first it seemed unaccountable, and I could not see how one who could talk but soo poorly, could pray so unusually well. But now the matter is intelligible enough, and the explanation is simple. First, here was the power of habit. We can readily perceive that the good brother was familiar with the place and the duty of prayer. The language of entreaty and thanksgiving was not new to him. He uttered it as one speaks his mother tongue, with great freedom and readiness. It was probably the language of the thoughts which were more commonly in his mind than any other. He probably said more to his Maker than he did to his fellow men. Yet it was no mere formal exercise with him on that occasion—one learned by rote, and repeated from memory. His prayer was peculiarly appropriate to circumstances, and was obviously made for the occasion. It was just the outpouring of a heart accustomed to commune so frequently with Heaven, that it knew, and could freely use, the language of heaven. And it was delightful to listen to such converse!

Secondly, there was evidence that the Lord helps those to pray, who try to pray much and well. Those who seek for a "spirit of grace and of supplication," will assurddly find it. "Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear." The request of the disciples, "Lord, teach us to pray," met with a prompt and favorable answer. In the case of which we have been speaking, the habit of looking frequently unto God in prayer was rewarded with such a power of prayer as few possess, and that, too, in the very teeth of a physical impediment which seemed to render the thing an impossibility.

Does not this case furnish a forcible rebuke to such as excuse themselves from the discharge of Christian social duties on the plea of their incompetency to perform them well? Is that plea sufficient? Might they not qualify themselves, if they were sufficiently earnest and persevering in their efforts to do so?

On the whole, I conclude that the prayer of that brother who could address his Maker so much more readily than he could possibly speak to his fellow-men, was as rich and profitable an exercise for me as any, perhaps, in which I had ever engaged. I trust my astonishment at the time did not prevent my joining heartily in the devotions, while the incident taught me some very useful lessons, which I think I shall remember to my latest day.

FUNERALS IN THE EAST.

All over the East funerals are attended by hired mourners. These are generally women, who fill the air with lamentations. The children in the streets often suspend their sports as the funeral train passes, and strive to imitate the melancholy sounds. Hence the words of our Saviour, "Whereunto shall I liken the men of this generation? They are like unto children sitting in the markets and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have mourned unto you and ye have not lamented."

Music is often introduced to aid the voices of the mourners; the trumpet is used at the funerals of the great, and the small pipe or flute for the lower classes. In Egypt the poorer people call in women who play on the tabor, and sing elegaic airs, to the sound of that instrument, which they sometimes accompany with the most frightful distortions of their limbs. Dr. Smith, in his Pilgrimage to Egypt, says, "I have seen a woman raise herself into a perfect frenzy by her weeping and frantic gesticulations; and all perhaps for a para, (the fifth part of a cent,) for some one she never saw, or cared a fig for if she had."

The noise and tumult of these mourners usually began immediately after the person expired. This was the case in the house of Jairus, where our Lord put out the minstrels who were making such lamentations around the bed on which the dead body of his daughter lay. This custom of hired mourners is evidently of great antiquity, as the following passage from Jeremiah will show. "Call for the mourning women that they may come, and send for cunning women that they may come, and let them make haste and take up a wail for us; that our eyes may run down with tears, and our eyeilds gush out with waters." Jer. 9: 17.

A recent traveler in Egypt relates the following.—"A man had been drowned, his body had been recovered from the river, and lay upon a mat under the shelter of some palms; a crowd of women with disheveled hair were seated round the corpse, beating their naked bosoms and screaming out their lamentations over one who had suddenly become endowed with every virtue in the Koran. One woman, with a loud, wailing voice, would recapitulate some of the perfections of the dead; and when she paused, the rest all cried in chorus, 'Wiley! wiley! wo! wo!'" This lamentation is singularly like that of the women in Ireland; and one traveler affirms that the orientals ask the same pathetic, but unanswerable question that the bereaved Irish mother put to their dead.—"Why did you die, darling? Why did you die?"

These ancient customs must all yield to the power of that gospel which brings life and immortality to light. The spirit of true religion is fatal to all such immoderate, not to say hypocritical grief. The signs of the times lead us to hope that the day-star is about to dawn on the darkness of Mohammedanism; and then we may expect that ere long the consolations of a pure Christianity shall control and soften their grief, teaching them how to mourn as true Christians, and "not as those without hope."

DEATH OF JOHN KNOX.

The last number of the Westminster Review has an eloquent and candid sketch of the life of the great Scottish Reformer. The last scene of his anxious life is thus touchingly depicted:—

On Monday, the 24th of November, he got up in the morning, and partially dressed himself, but feeling weak, he lay down again. They asked him if he was in pain. "It is no painful pain," he answered, "but such a one as, I trust, will put an end to the battle."

His wife sat by him, with a Bible open on her knees. He desired her to read the fifteenth of the first Corinthians. He thought he was dying as she finished it. "Is not that a beautiful chapter?" he said; and then added, "Now, for the last time, I commend my spirit, soul and body, into thy hands, O Lord." But the crisis passed off for the moment. Towards evening he lay still for several hours, and at 10 o'clock "they went to their ordinary prayer, which was the longer, because they thought he was sleeping." When it was over, the physician asked him if he had heard anything. "Aye," he said, "I wad to God that ye and all men heard as I have heard, and I praise God for that heavenly sound."

Suddenly thereafter, he gave a long sigh and sob, and cried out, "Now it is come!" Then Richard Bannatyne, sitting down before him, said, "Now, sir, the time that ye have long called for, to wit, an end of your battle, is come; and seeing all natural power now fails, remember the comfortable promise which oft-time ye have shown to us, of our Saviour Christ; and that we may understand and know that ye hear us, make us some sign;" and so he lifted up his hand, and incontinent thereafter, rendered up the spirit, and slept away without any pain.

A TOUCHING GIFT.—A venerable man in New Jersey recently called on a clergyman whom he had heard present the cause of the Bible, and handing him a gold dollar, said: "This was given me as a pocket piece; but, with a dying world before me, I cannot keep it longer—I bring it to you, and wish you to implore God's blessing on it, that it may do good to some soul." When told it would procure four Bibles, he added, "Then four souls more will be without excuse if they perish."

Board Meetings.

☞ QUARTERLY MEETINGS of the Executive Boards of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary and Publishing Societies and the American Sabbath Tract Society, will be held at Plainfield, N. J., on Fifth-day, Jan. 5, 1854, commencing at 10 o'clock A. M., and continuing through the afternoon and evening.

SABBATH OF THE CHINESE REVOLUTIONISTS.

Notwithstanding all the developments thus far made concerning the religion of the Chinese Insurgents, there is something about it which we do not understand. Do they keep the Bible Sabbath, or not? We have anxiously awaited something that would throw light on this question, but we are yet in the dark. From our own missionaries we have no communications later than the 1st of June. At that time it was reported, that the Insurgents were observing the seventh day of the week as holy time. It was so stated to our missionaries in Shanghae, and what they heard they reported to us. Their authority seemed to be reliable. The officers of the Hermes, the British ship of war that went up to Nanking to make exploration, asserted that they found the Insurgents keeping the seventh day. The Chinese teacher of the Rev. Mr. Taylor, a convert to Christianity, and a native of Nanking, having visited that place a short time before the Hermes did, brought back word that the Insurgents were Sabbatarians. How happened it, that such reports were brought by persons who were themselves in the observance of the first day of the week, if there was no foundation for them? We must add, that we have seen the same account of the matter in some paper that we read two or three months ago, though we have forgotten who the author was.

On the other hand, it has been stated by some on this side of the water, that the Insurgents observed the first day of the week as the Sabbath. The Rev. Mr. Baldwin, a Baptist minister of this city, in a discourse which was published in the Tribune not long ago, asserted it, though he did not give his authority. Whether they really were authorized to make the assertion, or whether, from hearing it said that the Insurgents were observers of the Sabbath, they took for granted, without particular inquiry, that the Sabbath observed by them was the so-called Christian Sabbath, we do not know. At all events, their sources of information have not been given to the public; and from the other side of the water, nothing [illegible] which contradicts the report first given by our missionaries.

The New York Tribune has published two lengthy communications from the Rev. Mr. Taylor—the same referred to above, as we suppose—upon the Religion of the Insurgents. We have read them, hoping to find this question cleared up. Not the remotest allusion to it do we find, thus far. In connection with this silence we place the statement, which has so frequently been reiterated by them that have written on the subject, that "the religion of the Rebels would appear to be more that of the Old Testament than of the New." But in what respect this charge is true, we are not informed. It is very certain that they are not looking for a Saviour to come; for they acknowledge Jesus Christ as the true and only Saviour of sinners. It is true, that on funeral occasions they are said to offer up presentations of animals, wine, tea, and rice, to the Great God; but it is not yet shown that these offerings are relied upon as having any thing to do in the way of cleansing them from their sins, or that they are any thing more than expressions of their reverence for the Supreme Being. In what respect, then, is their religion "more that of the Old Testament than the New?" We rather suspect that Sabbath-keeping—the keeping of the seventh day of the week rather than the first—is the fact upon which this accusation is in part grounded. For such is the incorrigible blindness of most of our first-day brethren, that they can see nothing but Judaizing in the religion of those who, acknowledging the binding nature of the Fourth Commandment, believe that it means just what it says.

Another significant circumstance is found in the extraordinary zeal manifested just now by sundry missionary organizations, to flood the "land of Sinim" with New Testaments. It would really seem, that the delusion of many of our first-day friends was about complete. They have so long been accustomed to read the New Testament through the lens of Puritan theology, that they actually suppose it to contain a warrant for Sunday-keeping as express as the Westminster Catechism. However, we have no objection to having the Chinese supplied with New Testaments; the more the better, provided they are circulated without note or comment. For we are sure that, without some tutorage in the creeds of sectarians, no one would ever dream, from reading the New Testament alone, that Sunday had been substituted for the Sabbath of the Decalogue.

Though we have some suspicion, that the reported Sabbatarianism of the Chinese Insurgents will turn out to be a fact, we are still not without our misgivings. And should it even be a fact, we still have our fears that they may be perverted from it. The great leader of the insurrection is said to have been, formerly, a pupil of the Rev. I. J. Roberts, a First-day Baptist missionary at Canton. He is represented as having derived from Mr. R. his knowledge of the Christian Religion. But, certainly, he did not derive the practice of Sabbath keeping from this source. And if he had been led into it in some other way, there is reason to fear that he has, before this, received some tutorage in the popular system of Christendom.

We have now lying before us a recent issue (Nov. 5th) of the Tennessee Baptist, which gives some important information touching this point. It had been proposed by his brethren in Nashville, that Mr. R. leave China, and take up his residence in California, as a missionary among the Chinese of that country. To this proposition Mr. R. replies, that "it is a moral impossibility." He believes that the field in California is very important, but says, "I think my call to Nanking is more important, and is of the Lord." He represents, that Hunz, the chief of the Insurgents in China, who was then at Nanking, had written to him, inviting him "to come and teach them the gospel way more fully, that they may receive baptism—immersion—and that the true doctrines of the gospel may flourish." This invitation he decides to accept, and says, "Never before was so bright a vision of usefulness before me, and though dark spots, like those in the sun, may be found filling up the minutia of operation, yet, should the Lord please, the realization will not come greatly short of the anticipation, but in fact often surpass it in such cases, because our trust is not in ourselves, as in worldly matters, but in the Lord Almighty."

The letter of Mr. R., containing these extracts, is dated July 6th, on board the ship "Ariel." He was then on his way to Shanghae, having left Canton "without ever expecting to return." No doubt he is now at Nanking. The Tennessee Baptist remarks: "God has raised our Bro. Roberts to occupy a position filled by no one since the days of Daniel, to teach the throne and its courtiers, and to mould the religious destiny of half the world! If he errs, he will cause an Empire to err—if he strays, he leads after him half of the world's population. Did ever a case more demand the prayers of our whole denomination?"

It is indeed a case demanding prayer, not merely of "our whole denomination," but of those who love the Sabbath of the Lord. We wonder whether our people have made it a matter of prayer. The letters of Messrs. Carpenter and Wardner were received here about the middle of August—not far from the time Mr. R. made his arrival at Shanghae. They were published immediately, and their contents ought to have been regarded as nothing short of a Providential summons of our people to their knees. That was exactly the time when they ought to have knelt before God—the time when Mr. R. was probably in Shanghae. But did they pray? Did they call upon God, who holds all hearts in his hand, to interpose for the truth, and to make the Sabbath of the Bible the Sabbath of the Chinese Empire? We are fearfully suspicious, that there was a guilty omission here. Alas! some of our people—we trust they are very few—have but little faith in prayer. Others have so little faith in God's power to do any thing without means, that they never feel any heart to pray, till they see the means already in operation, and in a pretty fair way to accomplish the result. If the means appear to be working pretty decidedly towards a contrary result, they have no faith to call upon God any longer. They cease praying then, as if the Almighty were tied up to such modes of operation as their own little minds can conceive of.

When our missionaries told us, that the Chinese Revolutionists were reported to be Sabbath-keepers, these unbelieving brethren participated in the pleasure which we all felt. But neither they, nor the rest of the denomination, contemplated the threatening contingency which has since arisen. It never entered their minds, that the teacher who imparted the rudiments of Christianity to the Chief of the Revolutionists, was to be brought from Canton to Nanking, to be a guide in religion. Probably they supposed that, so far as Sabbath-keeping was concerned, the work was pretty much done, and that it only remained for our missionaries to step in with their counsel, and confirm the Revolutionists in their practice. They did not know that it was necessary to pray for Mr. Roberts' conversion to right views regarding the Sabbath, so that he might not lead an empire astray. Well, it was impossible for them to be aware of any such necessity at that time; but they might, and ought, to have known, that nothing less than the direct interposition of the Spirit of God was sufficient to establish, among the millions of China, a practice so completely at variance with that of all the rest of the Christian world as the keeping of the seventh day. Why did they not lay it to heart? Why did they not wrestle with God night and day, that he would defeat every opposing agency, and make foolish the wisdom of this world? Had they done so—had we all done so—peradventure Mr. Roberts himself might have become "taught in the gospel way more fully" before his arrival at Nanking; and so he, in whom the Chief of the Insurgents doubtless reposes more confidence as a Christian guide than in all others, would be the means of giving the Sabbath to half the population of the globe.

But is it too late to pray now? Certainly not. God is almighty still. If the end is desirable—if it is right—if it is in accordance with his will, he will not be at a loss for a way to accomplish it. To us, the right direction of Mr. Roberts' mind would seem to be very important at this crisis. It would seem as if his conversion to our views were almost indispensable—that the day is lost, if his influence is thrown against us. But to God it may appear far otherwise. It is not necessary that we see how God can defeat his influence; it is sufficient for us to know that God is infinite in power. T. B. B.

LATEST NEWS FROM CHINA.

Since the foregoing was written, we have received letters from our missionaries, dating as late as Sept. 13th. They contain no positive statement, that the Insurgents do observe the seventh day of the week; but, from the fact that the statements in former communications are neither contradicted nor modified, we infer that they do, or at least, that such is the prevailing impression at Shanghae. But let our readers judge for themselves.

Extract from Mr. Carpenter's Letter.

It is very gratifying to us to learn, that the Board are inclined to look so favorably upon that branch of our prospective labors which relates to the Honan Jews. We have heard nothing from them since they left here, about a year ago. Indeed, the state of the country has been such that, in the absence of postal arrangements, we could hardly expect any communication. But when the way shall be opened, it will be a very serious question for us to settle, What we shall do for them? As to sending any natives unaccompanied by a foreigner, it is not likely that we shall think best to do it. But another question may come up sooner. The way may be opened to Chung Kaung and Nanking for months, and perhaps for years, before it will be safe traveling all the way to Kai Fong Foo. Indeed, I should not wonder if access to the former places might be had in a month.

Of my poor labors for the last three months I cannot say much. The hot season has been upon us, taking away a portion of my strength. In addition to regular preaching once or twice a week, I have been giving some attention to the Court dialect, which is understood all over the empire, and to the books of the Revolutionists. * * * *

On the 7th inst. there was a local insurrection in Shanghae, previously concerted. All the Mandarins in the city were deposed, and their goods confiscated. The Criminal Judge of the city was murdered at about sunrise. From that day, the Insurgents have had complete possession of the city. It is not clear whether they are connected with the Quang-si Revolutionists, or not. They profess to be, and if they are not, perhaps they soon will be. It may depend upon the fact whether they will have power to stand alone, or not. The Insurgents are Cantonese, Fukien men, and Chin-chou men, and many of the poorer class of Shanghae men are joining them as soldiers, some probably for the loaves and fishes. The city is under martial law, and they seem disposed to keep order. They have issued proclamations setting forth their object, which is about the same with the Revolutionists from Quang-si, and other local insurrectionists in other places. They all aim at the upsetting of the throne of the Tartars. The head man in this local insurrection is named Lew, a Cantonese. Three days ago, in company with Bro. Wardner, I called upon this man. His head quarters are close by us. He received me politely, and promised to send my Tract to the chief of the Revolutionists at Nanking. The next day he sent it to me, with the request that I write it over on very thin paper, so as to reduce its bulk. This is in consequence of the difficulty of getting through the Imperialists to Nanking. Tong has got it nearly copied in very fine character, and very beautifully done, and it will be diminished to less than one fourth its former bulk. I am anxious to get this forwarded in good season When the next opportunity will occur, I know not, but hope it may be in a few days.

I have conversed freely with Rev. Mr. Roberts on the Sabbath question, and find him to be on the any-day system, provided it be the most popular day. He is decidedly opposed to the Revolutionists keeping the Jewish Sabbath, because it is not the day most generally observed thoughout Christendom; and his mind is fixed there. You probably know that Tae-ping-wang, the Chief of the Revolutionists, has sent for him to proceed to Nankin. So you see what we have to hope for, if his counsels prevail. But God rules. May He bless our humble efforts! Let our brethren not cease to pray for China's evangelization generally, and for the observance of the Sabbath by this great people particularly.

Mr. Wardner's letter makes no allusion to the religious character of the Revolutionists. The only item of general interest respects the local insurrection in Shanghae referred to by Mr. Carpenter. It is as follows:—

The same morning that we got your letter, (Sept. 7th,) Shanghae was taken by a force raised mostly in this region, and said to be under the direction of Tae-ping-wang. Only the city magistrate was killed, though some were wounded; and his life would probably have been spared, had he not rendered himself odious by his cruelty to prisoners of late, several having died under his hand from beating and starvation.

The insurgent force has increased greatly, since the city was taken, and increases rapidly every day. The poor, who live from hand to month, feel these changes very much, and are turning soldiers for the sake of the pay.

The leader has had interviews with our minister, Mr. Marshall, and has promised that Americans shall not be injured in person or property. The Shanghae people who do not join them, are greatly terrified, and are fleeing to the country as fast as they can get out, which is rather slowly, as the city gates are closed a good portion of the time to prevent plunder.

It was known for some time, that a formidable band was forming secretly for some purpose, but when they would rise was not known till they appeared. It seems, they lay concealed outside the North Gate, and at daybreak, when the guards, as usual, opened for the country people to bring in their produce, they rushed in, and by seven o'clock the city was in their hands. About nine, I passed through, and saw the mangled body of the magistrate. The Insurgents, with red badges, and armed with swords, spears, or guns, and some with clubs, were passing to and fro in numbers of one to a hundred, or more, and heralds with gongs were passing and repassing, calling upon the merchants to open their shops, and proceed to business.

Last Sabbath I preached, for the first time under the new reign, from the words, "And his name shall be called Immanuel."

NATIONAL SALUTATIONS.

Every people or nation have certain national or provincial expressions, indicative of their peculiarities and national characteristics. We will confine ourselves, in illustration, to a few complimentary salutations.

We are informed by writers on the subject, from whom we quote, that "peace" is the common salutation among warlike nations—indicating by their first word on meeting, what they most desire, and what they are fighting so hard to obtain. Hence the ancient warlike Jews used to meet each other with a hearty expression signifying peace. The Arab, the chief feature of whose religion is that every thing is fore-ordained and fore-doomed, salutes you with, "If God will, thou art well"—"If God will, all the members of thy family enjoy good health." The prayerful Turk says, "Be under the guard of God"—"Forget me not in thy prayers." The obsequious and facile Persian fluently asks, "How is the state of thine honor?"—"Is thine exalted high condition good?"—"May not thy shadow be removed from our heads?" The first inquiry of the quiet, rice-loving Chinese, is, "Have you eaten your rice?"—"Is your stomach in good order?"

The happy, joyous Greek, always met his friend with, khaire, that is, rejoice. The more robust Roman's salutation was, salve, be healthy, or vale, be strong—often accompanied with the question, Quid agis?—what doest thou? The impressionable, eager, restless, vivacious, vaporing, active, aggressive Frenchman, flippantly inquires, "How do you carry yourself?" The German's first inquiry is, "How goes it?"—not you, but it. On parting he would say, "Live well." The good, generous-hearted Irishman, would say, "Long life to your honor!"—"May you make your bed in glory!" "How do you do?" "How are you?" "Are you well?"—are expressions of the English and Americans—indicating a kind of half-way spleeny, careful, anxious sort of a disposition, that takes a sort of motherly interest in one's neighbors, so far as to ascertain their health. If satisfied upon that point, it is all that we care about, particulaly.

On the starting of cars, steamboats, and the like, the Englishman cries, All right—indicating his prudence and care in the management of affairs. The cry and watchword of the Yankee, on such occasions, is, Go ahead—caring but little for conditions, for consequences, if so be, he only gets ahead. *

SKETCHES FROM NOTES OF A TOUR THROUGH VIRGINIA AND OHIO.

Having been appointed by the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, to attend the Anniversaries of our sister Associations of Virginia and Ohio, with the understanding that they were to be held, in point of time, so that it would be convenient, attending one, to pass immediately on to the other, when I found that more than a month would elapse between them, I thought that the difficulties in the way would, perhaps, be sufficient to prevent me from undertaking to fill the appointment. To attend them both, without returning between them, would be keeping me a long time from my charge at home. To attend them both, making the journey from home each time, would increase the already large expense which the Association was incurring in delegations, farther than I felt warranted in doing. And to attend only one, would be a discrimination which I did not feel at liberty to make. Yet the strong interest which these Associations had manifested in having some one with them at their anniversaries, together with a statement of their feeble and discouraged condition, gave me a strong inclination to go. Feeling that the length of time, could it be well spent on the fields, added to the prospect of the utility of the enterprise, I laid the matter before the church, referring them to their own early history, and they cordially gave their consent for me to go, and spend the time necessary to attend both Associations.

I accordingly left home August 29th, for Doddridge County, Va., where the Association was to open, September 2d. Taking the Express on the New York and Erie Railroad the next morning, arrived at Dunkirk about noon; thence up the Lake shore to Cleveland, Ohio, where I arrived the same evening. My way, as I had chosen it, from here, was the Cleveland and Pittsburgh Railroad to Wellsville, on the Ohio River, fifty miles below Pittsburgh. As there was no through train until the next day at 10 o'clock A. M., I must wait in Cleveland until that time. Here I found a very commendable arrangement, by which the traveler is relieved from the terrible nuisance of being besieged by a graceless gang of "Hotel Runners." There is an omnibus line, running from the railroad station and steamboat landings to all the principal hotels in the city, by which one can quietly go, and have his baggage carried, to any "house" he may prefer. The distance from Cleveland to Wellsville is 100 miles. The country along the Railroad, the most of the way, is level; but as you approach the Ohio river, it is more uneven, and the hills contain coal.

The Ohio river was so low that it could be navigated only with the smaller craft. For this purpose they use what they call stern-wheel boats. They are a grotesque looking affair, with furnaces, boilers, and engine, all on the main deck; and, as the name implies, a wheel at the stern. At such times of low water, these little boats monopolize the trade, and they make the traveler pay for all he has.

After waiting four or five hours at Wellsville, there came along a boat, and I took passage for Wheeling, Va., a distance of 46 miles. Our movement was a fit illustration of "slow motion imitated." The boat was frequently "aground," and an extra amount of steam must be brought into requisition to get her clear. The night was dark and rainy, and very uncomfortably warm to be in berth; but I lay down, and after a long watching, I fell so completely asleep, that I did not awake when the boat stopped at Wheeling. When morning came, I stepped, for the first time, upon the soil consecrated to slavery.

Wheeling is a place of some consequence; rendered especially so, as the western terminus of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. There is, also, at this place, a suspension bridge across the Ohio river, forming an immediate connection between the land of bondage and that of freedom.

As it was impossible for me to reach my destination in season, if I undertook to proceed farther by the river, I determined to take the cars, by which I could, without much delay, go within thirty-three miles of New Salem, the gathering point of one of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches of Virginia.

At a little past 9 o'clock A. M., September 1st, having paid $3,50 for a ticket to Fetterman, a distance of 97 miles, I was seated in the cars. I found a marked difference in the style and finish of the cars here and in the Free States—a difference by no means commendatory of Southern enterprise and taste. The first time the conductor came through, he took the tickets of way passengers, without giving in return any check, or other evidence that their fare had been paid. I wondered a little at the arrangement, but I made no remonstrance, and asked no questions. We proceeded down the Ohio river eleven miles, enjoying a pleasant view of the country, especially across the river on the Ohio side; but from this point the train had not passed over a great distance, before I began to think the conductor would have little trouble in detecting any addition to his load, though it might consist of self-moving freight. We literally "penetrated" the hills of the "Old Dominion;" for before we had made sixty miles, we had passed through seven tunnels. I thought I had seen wildness in connection with Railroad travel, but I soon found it necessary to yield the point. The country is tumbled up into hills and mountains, with their bases so near to each other, that there is, in many instances, barely room for the passage of a narrow stream. The streams are crooked beyond description; the water running to almost every conceivable point of compass They frequently turn so short as to form an acute angle, and the spur of the intervening hill, completely conforming to the angle, makes a bold high bluff. To avoid too sharp a curve in the road, these spurs are parted for the track; making cuts through rock, apparently from twenty to sixty feet deep. When one looks out from his position in the cars, he frequently seems to be hemmed in on every side, and he wonders at what point he is to find a passage; but as the train moves on, a sharp curve is made, and he passes into another basin-among-the-hills, with as little promise of a way out.

The first place that we passed, deserving the appellation of village, was Fair Mount, on the Monongahela river, from Wheeling seventy-seven miles; yet there are human habitations along the line of the Railroad, within a few miles of each other, the whole distance. They are, however, mostly rude specimens of architecture, apparently constructed without boards, or even nails. The country, except the small patches of clearing along the streams in the vicinity of the dwellings, is an unbroken forest.

At Fair Mount there is a suspension bridge over the Monongahela, and though it is every way inferior to the one at Wheeling, it is a great work for such a place. I think that they were both built by the same man who built that at Niagara Falls. Near this place there is also a splendid iron railroad bridge over the same river. I had been expecting to be brought out into some more desirable region of country before leaving the cars—an expectation, however, which was disappointed. It was all the same, only the settlements were older, and a little larger share of the land had been brought under cultivation.

Reached Fetterman about 3 o'clock P. M. Here I took the stage for New Salem, where I arrived about half-past 11 the same evening. The stage-house here is kept by Peter F. Randolph, who the next morning kindly furnished me with a horse to ride on my way towards New Milton, (distant fourteen miles,) until I should fall in with others on their way to the Association, who might furnish me a conveyance. I was also accompanied by a boy on horseback, to return the horse I rode. After proceeding seven or eight miles, we fell in company with a man riding in a wagon, (rather an unusual mode of traveling in Western Virginia,) going within a mile or two of the place of meeting. I chartered a seat in this wagon, and dismissed my boy, to return with the horses. By the time this charter expired, I was in company with a number of friends on horseback, who carried my baggage, and also urged me to ride; but as I could not without displacing some one, I determined to finish my journey by the primitive mode of travel. OUR PALESTINE MISSION.

The Committee on the outfit of our missionaries have nothing new to communicate in regard to the time of sailing. They still hope for an early opportunity by vessel to Jaffa or Smyrna.

The cause seems continually progressive in the affections of the people; there seems to be an appropriating in this work of benevolence for Seventh-day Baptists toward the house of Israel. The priest and levite of the Gentile world have, for centuries, passed by on the other side when material aid was in question, selfishly muttering, "Be ye warmed and filled," while at the same time they have bound upon the Jews grievous burdens, which they were unable to bear, instead of giving them those things which were needful to the body. But it is time to inquire, "What doth it profit, though a man say he have faith, and have not works? Can faith save him?" The Christian philanthropists of other denominations begin also to wonder at the cold-hearted missions so long and successfully persisted in to the poor Jews in the land of their fathers, and many are preparing to fulfill one of their first principles of active Christianity, by engaging in those works which the Gospel requires for the present and prospective relief of the poor down-trodden Israelite. And we believe, if God does not prosper this work in our hands, it will be for want of faithfulness, and not in the opposition or antipathy to them whom He declares are beloved for their fathers' sake. No! God will be faithful to reward, if we serve him aright in this thing. We believe it will be an acceptable service. No cause has been adopted with more unanimity by the Missionary Board of our denomination, or by the people, so far as yet ascertained, than this practical mission to the children of Abraham.

The following is from the pen of the afflicted father of Emma E. Hawley, whose death was announced in the last number of the Recorder:

"Dear Friend—As you are one of the Committee for the Palestine Mission, in accordance with their request, I take much pleasure in forwarding the enclosed seven dollars, which you will please credit. Our daughter, Emma E., expressed quite an anxiety, during her last days, to do a trifle for the cause. The amount of her funds, $1, in accordance with her desire forwarded, while her spirit is undoubtedly associated with many of all nations in chanting the praises above."

A friend of the Mission in New Jersey thus writes to Sister Jones:—

"Eighteen hundred years hath Zion been wasted by the spoiler, her bulwarks broken, her palaces destroyed, her hills and valleys barren and unfruitful. Eighteen hundred years have her children been wanderers and outcasts, despised and persecuted by all nations. But a glorious day for Palestine is dawning. The gloom of superstition must flee before the light of the gospel. The land of the ancient prophets and holy men, the land where the blessed Saviour lived and died must be delivered from the thraldom of error and sin; and there shall be a jubilee more joyful than those of olden time, even the jubilee of the angels in heaven over the ancient people of God, ransomed, enlightened, disenthralled. Happy are those whom God shall choose to assist in this grand work. May the time soon arrive when it may be said, in the language of the prophet, 'Arise! shine! for thy light is come, the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee.'"

We omit, for the sake of brevity, much more of great interest on this subject; but deem the concluding impromptu stanzas not inappropriate; and therefore take the liberty of inserting them:—

"Go ye forth to Palestine,
Self-devoted mission band;
Bear the Gospel, joyful tidings
In that long-neglected land.

Trust in the Lord Jehovah,
In his arm is power and might,
He will ever help and guide you,
While you're striving for the right.

Watch and pray, and toil, and struggle;
Never yield to doubt or fear;
Though dark clouds may gather round you
God the Lord is ever near.

Ye may sow in tears and sorrow,
Deeming all your labor vain,
But you'll come again rejoicing,
Bringing sheaves of precious grain. S. S. L.

The Meteodists in this city are beginning to feel the spirit of an active benevolence toward the Jews; and many of their leading members have sought interviews with us, regarding the nature of the circumstances attending the work of an agricultural character; but we tell them and all others, Do all in your power; there is room for all; but let not the Sabbath of Jehovah be profaned in that land, for, as a punishment for its profanation in former times, the land, by the prediction of God, has been enjoying a Sabbath of repose and barrenness. Her fields shall again blossom with promise of fruitful harvests, and her hills reecho with the song of the husbandman.

The Editor of the "Pennsylvania Freeman," after noticing the intended departure of our missionaries for Palestine says:—

"Mr. and Mrs. Jones were formerly engaged in the Haytien mission, under the patronage of the Free Mission Society. They are thorough abolitionists, and, at home or abroad, will teach the anti-slavery gospel, never fearing to 'declare the whole counsel of God, whether men will hear or forbear.' Though we know of no missionary field which has more need of such laborers than the American Churches and people, and can afford to lose from this home mission any devoted laborers, we give to our friends our warmest wishes for their health, happiness and usefulness on their voyage and in their far home in a strange land."

CLOSELY BOUND

TEACHING NEGROES TO READ.

A case was recently tried in the Circuit Court at Norfolk, Va., which shows in a striking light what kind of laws are considered necessary for the perpetuation of slavery. It appears, that some months ago, information reached His Honor the Mayor, Simon S. Stubbs, Esq., of a school for the education of blacks being in successful operation in the City of Norfolk, under the superintendence of Mrs. Douglas. A warrant was immediately issued, with directions to the officers to bring all parties concerned before him, in order that the matter might be investigated. Upon repairing to the residence of Mrs. Douglas, the officers found some eighteen or twenty youthful descendants of Ham engaged in literary pursuits, all of whom, with their teachers, were taken into custody and carried to the Mayor's Office. After a full investigation of the matter, His Honor decided to dismiss the complaint, in order that a Grand Jury might have an opportunity of giving it consideration. At the meeting of the Grand Jury a true bill was found against Mrs. Douglas and her daughter, but the latter having previously gone to New York, process could not be served upon her.

When the trial came on, Mrs. Douglas examined her own witnesses and pleaded her own case. She called up several prominent and respectable gentlemen, members of the Church, for the purpose of showing that the practice of teaching blacks had been sanctified by the customs of the members of the different Churches in the city in having Sunday Schools exclusively for that purpose. It did not appear, however, from the evidence of any of the gentlemen called upon by Mrs. Douglas, that they had actually seen negroes taught from books in any of the Sunday Schools of the city, but the fact, as stated by them, that nearly all the negroes attending the Sunday Schools could read, gave rise to a suspicion that many of the ladies and gentlemen of the city, moving in the higher circles of society, had been guilty of as flagrant a violation of the law, as could be imputed to Mrs. Douglas and her daughter,

At the conclusion of the evidence, Mrs. Douglas made her appeal to the Jury, which was done in a manner that would have reflected credit on any member of the "strong-minded" sisterhood. She disdained to deny the charge preferred against her, or to shirk the responsibility in any way whatever, but gloried in the philanthropic duties in which she had been engaged. She denied, however, any knowledge of the existing laws upon the subject, and confidently expected that the Jury would not pronounce her guilty for having committed no other offense than that of being betrayed into error, if such it was, by what she had deemed distinguished precedents. Having concluded her address, she retired from the Court, and the case was briefly concluded by the attorney for the Commonwealth.

The Jury could not agree at first, and were adjourned over till next morning, when they found the defendant guilty, and fined her $1. It is said that the Judge, in passing sentence according to the statute, will condemn Mrs. Douglas to imprisonment for not less than six months.

THE NEW CHINESE CALENDAR.—The insurgents in China have reformed the calendar, as well as the politics of the country :—

"This calendar makes every year to contain three hundred and sixty-six days, every odd month thirty-one days, and every even month thirty days. The seasons are: commencement of Spring, beginning February 14th; clear and bright season, beginning April 5th; period of bearded grain, beginning June 6th; commencement of Autumn, August 8th; season of cold dew, date not given; and season of great snow, December 7th.

"The editor of the North China Herald remarks of this new calendar, that it is undertaken to form a solar division of the months, instead of that combination of solar and lunar which has existed from time immemorial. Each of their months consists of two solar terms, or one sign of the zodiac. They also make another error in making the solar year consist of three hundred and sixty-six days every year, instead of once in four years. They also make their Sabbath fall on Saturday."

PETITION TO CONGRESS FOR PROTECTION ON THE SABBATH.—The following Petition is being circulated and signed among the German Seventh-day Baptists in Pennsylvania; and they would be glad to have also the signatures of their English brethren. Those friendly to the object are requested to copy the petition, get as many signatures as they can, and forward to John Monn, Jr., Quincy, Franklin Co., Pa.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States o fAmerica, in Congress assembled :—

We, the subscribers whose names are hereunto annexed, fully believe in the principles of freedom held forth by the Jews and Seventh-day Baptists, that the Government of the United States is bound to protect them on the first day of the week in the performance of their worldly occupations and business, in the same manner as the said Government protects the first-day people on the seventh day of the week in their occupations and business. And your humble petitioners pray to have an act passed to that effect.

THE SABBATH-SCHOOL VISITOR.—The third volume of the Sabbath-School Visitor ends with the December number. The first number of the fourth volume will be issued on or before the beginning of the new year. Now is the time, therefore, to renew old subscriptions and obtain new ones. It is hoped that in each of our societies an effort will be made immediately to get up lists of subscribers longer than ever before. The following are the terms :—

Five copies to one address	1 00
Twelve copies to one address	2 00
Twenty copies to one address	3 00

CONGRESS.—The XXXIIId Congress of the United States assembled at Washington on Second-day, Dec. 5. Both branches were promptly organized, Lynn Boyd being chosen Speaker of the House. After appointing the usual committees to notify the President, adjourned over to Third-day, when the Message would probably be delivered.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Rev. Jean Vernier, having visited France and Switzerland for the purpose, has obtained two or three ministers of Christ and five or six missionary schoolmasters to labor among the French Catholics. A spirit of inquiry, says Rev. Mr. Wilkes, is awaking here and there among the more educated classes; the faith of some in Rome is shaken; the youth particularly, in instances not a few, are thoughtful and desirous to know the truth. "Surely the Lord has purposes of mercy toward Popery-ridden French Canada."

Under the head of "Theological Students," the Christian Intelligencer says that all the colleges are crowded, while the theological seminaries count their students by dozens. Should not these facts awaken the spirit of prayer in the churches for the Spirit of God to descend upon all our colleges and the numerous, or rather innumerable, academies crowded with young men, whose conversion would fill the thin ranks of the ministry ?

The Nevada (California) Journal mentions as a curious fact, that many of the Chinamen in that region are Protestants, who take oath on the Bible in courts of Justice, and say they were converted in China by the labors of a missionary, whom they named with much love. They are peaceable and industrious, and give practical evidence that "their faith is illustrated by works."

A large Protestant bookstore has been established in Constantinople, where there are to be had copies of the Scriptures in twelve different languages. During the past year, more than ten thousand copies of the word of God were sent out from it, besides other religious books and tracts in the various languages of that part of the world.

It appears from a recent return, that the Universities in Germany and Switzerland had, in 1852, 18,181 students, of whom 1,880 were educating for the Catholic priesthood, 1,765 for the Protestant clergy, 6,762 for law and political economy, 4,183 for medicine and surgery, and 2,644 in philosophy.

Another version of the Bible has been completed in the language of the inhabitants of the Hervey group of Islands in the Pacific. The labors of English missionaries among them have been greatly blessed for many years. The Bibles in their native tongue were received with the greatest enthusiasm.

The movement in behalf of church extension in Detroit, which has been some time in anticipation, has been effected. The First Presbyterian church has been sold for some $40,000; and to this sum some $90,000 more has been added, with which it is proposed to erect three Presbyterian churches in that city.

The American and Foreign Bible Society has voted, that that Society is called upon, in the providence of God, to print and circulate, as soon as practicable, at least 20,000 Chinese New Testaments in the vast Empire, and that correspondence be had on this subject with the Missionary Union, Boston.

An old farmer and his wife, residing near Boston, were recently murdered at night. The murderer after his arrest confessed that he had been stimulated to such deeds by reading the biographies of criminals, whose feats he desired to emulate.

Hon. Charles Cook, late canal commissioner of New York, is erecting, at a cost of fifteen thousand dollars, a new Episcopal church in the village of Havana, Chemung county, to be presented to the society at that place.

One hundred and fifty thousand Bibles and Testaments have been circulated during the last six years in Northern Illinois, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, the weight of which is seventy-five tons.

Rev. Dr. Cox has completed the negotiations, commenced some time since, for the purchase of a residence in Owego, N. Y. It is designed for the summer residence of his family.

The Sunday-School connected with the First Presbyterian Church of Reading, have raised five hundred and fifty dollars for the Church Erection Fund.

Bishop De Lancey, of New York, and others of his brother bishops, endeavor to account for Bishop Ives' defection to Rome on the ground of insanity.

Among the students of Monson Academy, numbering over one hundred, there has been a gratifying season of religious interest during the Fall term.

By the authority of the "Index Expurgatorium" at Rome D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation has been placed on the list of prohibited books.

Intelligence has been received of the death of Mrs. Nesbitt, of the Burman Mission.

SLAVERY ITEMS.

The Cincinnati Columbian says: "Last Friday a negro man, the property of James Thornberry, living near Louisville, drew a prize of $2,100 in the State Lottery. He is now, perhaps, rich enough to buy himself." To which another paper says: "Yes! but although as rich as Crœsus, it all belongs to his master, if he sees fit to claim it, according to slave-holding law. Does any one doubt that any master would be so mean as to appropriate it to his own use? Would it be worse, in any sense, than the case of the master in Covington, who contracted with his slave for the purchase of freedom, and after pocketing the price sold him into perpetual bondage, the Courts sustaining the shameful act ?

Wylie Kearney, of Caldwell County, Ky., was murdered last week by his two slaves, boys of 18 and 19 years, who made up a plot and executed it in revenge of his cruelty to them. While going out into the field to labor, he thrashed one of them, who resisted, the other coming to his aid. One of the two slipped up behind his master and threw a rope over his head, whereupon each one caught the ends of the rope and brought him to the ground, and with the rope and their hands killed him instantly by choking.

The Louisville Courier of the 12th ult., says that Col. John Reid, of Mason County, Ky., who had been for some days in that city on a visit, received intelligence that four of his slaves had been enticed away from his farm. Two of them, however, were subsequently captured, together with the white man who had been assisting them freedomward.

A lot of slaves, numbering sixteen, belonging to the heirs of Andrew P. Beirne, were sold at auction in Monroe County, Va., a few days ago, for $12,090 50. The Farmer's Friend says that three of them were infants, and one a very old woman. Twelve of them averaged $1,000 each, of which seven women and two of the men were only second or third rate.

Judy, a female slave on the plantation of Mr. E. B. Richardson, Bland County, North Carolina, recently died at the great age of 110. She was one of the eight slaves who nearly sixty years ago were the first settlers on the estate upon which she died, all but one of whom have reached a very advanced age.

The New Orleans Bulletin of Nov. 22d says: Three slaves were arraigned before the Recorder yesterday for gambling in a coffee house at the corner of Benjamin and New Levee-sts., and ordered to receive twenty lashes each, when their masters shall call for them. The slave Peter, belonging to a Mr. Pepper, was ordered to receive ten lashes for carrying a concealed weapon and threatening W. J. Redwood. The slaves are making "progress," evidently, and seem disposed to acquire fashionable habits.

The people of Alabama are vigorously agitating in favor of a law exempting slaves from execution for debt. The object of the law is to enable every man to own and keep one or more slaves, and thereby fortify and strengthen the Institution, giving the poorer classes an interest in its eternal perpetuity.

Last Saturday (says the Louisville Courier of Nov. 24) a fugitive slave, belonging to Judge Fitch, of this State, was captured in Jackson County, Ind., and given over to his owner. There was with him at the time he was taken a white girl, who had induced him to make his escape that she might join herself for life to his dark fortune.

We find the following paragraph in the Cincinnati Commercial of the 14th ult.: "Slave stampedes in Kentucky are becoming alarmingly frequent. On the night before last, three more escaped by means of flatboat skiffs, across the river, this side of Maysville."

SLAVEHOLDING JUSTICE.—The Richmond, Va., Mail of Nov. 24th, gives the following as an item of news, with no apparent consciousness of the cruel injustice it records, or the disgrace such a fact attaches to the community where it occurred:—

A mulatto woman, named Ann Matthews, was brought before the Mayor, yesterday, charged with being free and remaining in the Commonwealth contrary to law. From the evidence before the Mayor, it appeared that she is the property of Edward Matthews, who hires her to Mr. Robt. Lumpkin, who has her at a slave jail for the last three and a half years. About five years ago she was permitted by her owner to visit Philadelphia, where she remained three or four months, and left there a child, when she returned to Virginia, which child, we inferred from remarks at the examination yesterday, she had been in the habit of visiting. Mr. Matthews still claims her as his servant, and has more than once threatened to sell her. The Mayor discharged her, while he informed her owner and hirer that he should instruct the Police of the city to regard her as a slave, and see that she should not be allowed the privileges of a free woman.

THE WEAKNESS OF SLAVERY.—A discussion has been going on for some time in Alabama, as to the propriety of exempting a certain number of slaves from forced sale under execution, and a law insuring some provisions of this character, it is thought, will be enacted at the ensuing Legislature of the State. Its object is evidently and avowedly to strengthen the system of Slavery, by increasing the number of slaveholders. It is in fact a bribe to men of small means to become personally interested in Slavery by investing their capital in a species of property which may be held in spite of creditors. It is, moreover, to be made beneficial to the State in another way, as the persons applying for the benefit of it are to pay a bonus of twenty-five dollars for every slave, not exceeding five, so exempted, and the fund so created is to be used for purposes of education. The whole scheme is an acknowledgement of the weakness of Slavery, as it is based upon the fact that there is a large class which is not interested in the perpetuation of the system, and whose support it is worth while to purchase.

SUMMARY.

In the winter of 1848, the Rev. Thomas Waring mysteriously disappeared near Elizabethtown, Ky., and was then and still believed by his relatives and friends to have been murdered. Some year or more before the death of Mr. W., he had effected an insurance on his life, in favor of his wife, in the Nautilus Mutual Life Insurance Co. of N. Y. for $5,000. The Company, it appears, refused to pay the insurance to his widow, alleging that he was not dead, but had absconded. Suit was entered, and the case was decided in favor of Mrs. W., for the full amount, with interest.

A dispatch dated Pittsburgh, Friday, Dec. 2, 1853, says: Yesterday seventy suits under the Small Note law against the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., six against the Citizens' Deposit Co., fourteen against the Alleghany Savings Fund, sixty-two against the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Co., and thirteen against the Cleveland and Pittsburgh Railroad Co., were brought by Absalom Morris, late dry-goods merchant of this city, and two others, one a citizen of Ohio. The supposed object is to obtain half of the penalty, which will amount to a large sum.

The 'Prohibitionist' is the name of a new monthly quarto which the New York State Temperance Society propose to issue at Albany on the 1st of January next and of every month thereafter. Address Wm. H. Burleigh, Cor. Secretary, or O. Scoville, Publishing Agent, Albany.

Further particulars of the blowing up of the propeller Independence, at Saut Ste. Marie, have reached us. The explosion was caused by the neglect to let off steam during a stoppage for the purpose of completing the raising of the anchor. Seven lives were lost in all, and it is miraculous that the sacrifice was not greater, when it is considered that the boat was blown to atoms, with the exception of 25 feet of the bow.

Laban Mercer, arrested in Wetzell Co., Va., for murder, on the testimony of a ghost, has been sent on for trial at the spring term of the Circuit Court. The popular sentiment is very strong against him in his neighborhood.

A second edition of the Siamese Twins has lately been issued in North Carolina. The North Carolinian, Nov. 26, says: "The twins are negro children, 28 months old, naturally joined together in a remarkable manner. Their spines seem to grow together near their lower termination, and to form one common bone. Above and below the point of juncture they are entirely separate. They are females, and are quite lively and intelligent. Each preserves a distinct identity of feeling and action." They are now on exhibition at Fayettville.

A dispatch dated Washington, Friday, Dec. 2, 1853, says:—I have private advices from the City of Mexico to the 17th ult., to the effect that letters received there from Tepic, dated Nov. 12, state that two hundred armed men from San Francisco had just landed from the brig Caroline, at the port of La Paz, Lower California, and had taken possession of the town, put the Commanding General in prison, and declared Lower California independent. They have a flag with two stars, which is supposed by my Mexican informant to mean Lower California and Sonora.

The Governor of South Carolina, in his Message, says that the funded debt of the State is $1,870,986; the assets, $5,175,542. The Governor recommends a subscription of three-quarters of a million to the Blue Ridge Railroad, and the establishment of an improved system of education, with Commissioners of Public Instruction. He desires that the U. S. Supreme Court shall settle the disputed boundary with Georgia. The Governor is much pleased with the behavior of England in the matter of the imprisonment of colored seamen.

Mrs. Ward, a respectable woman living in Ashley County, Arkansas, was, a few nights since, "informed by a spirit" that her left hand had offended her Maker, and that to make her peace she must part with it. Mrs. Ward immediately got out of bed, procured an axe, and cut off her hand at the wrist. She then awoke her husband, telling him what she had done and why she had done it.

The Sussex Register relates the case of James Moran, aged 25, who drank himself to death on the 25th ult. He was a brilliant young man, and served in the Mexican war. He had often made attempts to forsake the bottle, by signing the pledge and joining the Sons of Temperance; but he was unsuccessful, and, as a last resort, strongly desired the enactment of the Maine Law in the State.

A slave, once the property of Blennerhasset, is now living on the plantation of Capt. Scott, near Jefferson, Texas. He was on Blennerhasset Island when the militia were sent there to arrest his master, and he remembers the incident well. He describes Aaron Burr as being the finest gentleman he ever saw, and says "white women in these days can't come up to what Mrs. Blennerhasset was."

Capt. J. Everson has recently secured a patent for glass tubes to conduct water from wells and cisterns, which supersedes those made of lead, iron, or wood. Autumn Woods.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

Ere, in the northern gale,
The summer tresses of the trees are gone,
The woods of Autumn, all around our vale,
Have put their glory on.

The mountains that infold,
In their wide sweep, the colored landscape round,
Seem groups of giant kings, in purple and gold,
That guard the enchanted ground.

I roam the woods that crown
The upland, where the mingled splendors glow,
Where the gay company of trees look down
On the green fields below.

My steps are not alone
In these bright walks; the sweet south-west, at play,
Flies, rustling, where the painted leaves are strown
Along the winding way.

And far in heaven, the while,
The sun, that sends that gale to wander here,
Pours out on the fair earth his quiet smiles—
The sweetest of the year.

Where now the solemn shade,
Verdure and gloom where many branches meet;
So grateful, when the noon of summer made
The valleys sick with heat.

Let in through all the trees
Come the strange rays; the forest depths are bright;
Their sunny-colored foliage, in the breeze,
Twinkles, like beams of light.

The rivulet, late unseen,
Where bickering through the shrubs its waters run,
Shines with the image of its golden screen,
And glimmers of the sun.

But 'neath yon crimson tree
Lover to listening maid might breathe his flame,
Nor mark, within its roseate canopy,
Her blush of maiden shame.

O, Autumn! why so soon
Depart the hues that made thy forest glad;
Thy gentle wind and thy fair sunny noon,
And leave thee wild and sad!

Ah! 'twere a lot too blessed
Forever in thy colored shades to stray;
Amid the kisses of the soft south-west
To rove and dream for aye;

And leave the vain low strife
That makes men mad—the tug for wealth and power,
The passions and the cares that wither life,
And waste its little hour.

White-washing Extraordinary.

The Rev. James Williams, the well-known philanthropic missionary, so long resident in the South Sea Islands, taught the natives how to manufacture lime from the coral of their shores. The powerful effect it produced upon them, and the extraordinary uses to which they applied it, he thus facetiously describes:

'After having laughed at the process of burning, which they believed to be to cook the coral for their food, what was their astonishment, when, in the morning, they found his cottage glittering in the rising sun white as snow—they danced, they sang, they shouted and screamed with joy. The whole island was in commotion, given up to wonder and curiosity, and the laughable scenes which ensued after they had obtained possession of the brush and tub, baffle description. The bon ton immediately voted it a cosmetic and kalydor, and superlatively happy did many a swarthy coquette consider herself, could she but enhance her charms by a dab of the white brush. And now party spirit ran high, as it will do in more civilized countries, as to who was, or who was not, best entitled to preference. One party urged their superior rank; one had got the brush and were determined at all events to keep it; and a third tried to overturn the whole, that they might obtain some of the sweepings. They did not even scruple to rob each other of the little share that some had been so happy as to secure. But some new lime was prepared, and in a week, not a hut, a domestic utensil, a war club, or a garment, but what was white as snow—not an inhabitant but had a skin painted with the most grotesque figures—not a pig but was similarly whitened—and even mothers might be seen in every direction, capering with extravagant gestures, and yelling with delight at the superior beauty of their white-washed infants.'

The Chinese Emperor and the Pretender.

It is a singular circumstance, that the two principal competitors in this tremendous struggle are two young men scarcely past their boyhood. The emperor Hienfoung is but twenty-two. He is of middling stature, and his limbs bear evidence to his aptness for physical exercises; he is slender and muscular. His physiognomy, which indicates resolution, is chiefly characterized by a very high forehead, and by the obliquity of his vision. His cheek bones are very prominent, and the space between his eyes is wide and flat like the brow of a buffalo. His character is marked by firmness and credulity. In the midst of luxury and effeminacy, he affects severe manners, and notwithstanding his youth, he is already married. The empress is a Tartar princess, with large feet, who has none of the daintiness and delicate graces of the small-footed ladies of China. The emperor loves to see her indulge in the violent exercises that amuse the women of her nation, and she often canters at his side through the immense gardens of the palace.

The chief of the insurrection, Tiente, is twenty-three, but study and vigils have prematurely aged him. He is grave and melancholy, and lives in great retirement, communicating with those around him only to give his orders. His face wears an expression of gentleness, but that gentleness peculiar to certain ascetics, which does not exclude the idea of firmness, or a kind of obstinacy often found in credulous natures. His complexion is that of the Chinese of the Southern provinces—a sort of saffron. He is taller than Hienfoung, but he appears less robust. Both have felt the influence of their education, and the moral is reflected in the physical formation. The young emperor, active, daring, with a bold glance, commands with haughtiness, and wishes to be blindly obeyed. Tiente, on the contrary, has an impassable gaze, that seems to lift, one by one, the folds that envelop the human soul, and plunge into its depths. He commands rather by suggestion than by direct dictation; in a word, he has the silent reserve of a man who has reflected much before disclosing his projects to any one. As to his general appearance, a Chinese gives the following description of the pretender's entrance into one of the numerous towns taken by his troops: "The new emperor's train reminded me of the scenes represented at our theatres and the pieces in which we see the heroes of ancient times who lived before we submitted to the yoke of the Tartars. The persons who surrounded Tiente had cut off their tails, let the whole of their hair grow, and instead of the chang, buttoned at the side, they wore tunics open in front. None of the officers wore on their right thumb the pan tche, that archer's ring which our mandarins display with so much ostentation. The emperor was in a magnificent palanquin, enveloped in yellow satin curtains, and carried by sixteen officers. After Tiente's palanquin came that of his preceptor, borne upon the shoulders of eight coolies; then came his thirty wives in painted and gilded chairs, and a multitude of servants and soldiers in beautiful order."

Village and Country Life in France.

In this ride from north to south we had a fine opportunity of seeing the country portions of France. In the main, the face of the country is very level, and is well cultivated. The people live in villages; and neither horses nor cattle are seen dispersed over the country as in Britain or with us. If now and then you see a cow feeding by the way side, it has always an attendant to keep it within bounds. There are no fences to be seen any where, and lines of trees running for miles without deviating from a straight line, constantly present themselves, till the eye is weary of seeing them. Where nothing richer can grow, the vine is sure to be planted. The hills are all vine clad, and are often prettily terraced for its cultivation. The vines are planted about as far apart as our hills of corn; the old stump seemed only a foot or two high; and the branches from the stump are only permitted to grow four or five feet long. Thus the strength of the tree is thrown into the fruit, instead of being permitted to expend itself in the production of long branches and many leaves. Vineyards thus cultivated were every where to be seen. They ran up the sides of the most steep acclivities, and capped the summits of the highest hills. Because they can stick a vine anywhere, the entire surface of the country is producing something.

The villages through which we pass present a very strong contrast to our American villages. The streets are so narrow as often to render it impossible for two carriages to pass each other. The houses are built directly on the street, without door-yard or pavement in front. Sometimes the horses are eating on the first floor, while you are eating on the second. And the air of neatness, cleanliness and comfort which is worn by our best American villages is generally absent from those of France.

The peasantry also seemed uncultivated, and of a low state of civilization. Women were every where working in the fields, and were doing all kinds of manual labor. And all along the canal, on the borders of which we traveled many miles, men were drawing the boat. The women seemed to be doing the work of men, and men the work of horses. In countries which support large standing armies, the men are needed for armies, for the deadly breach, as food for the cannon; and hence, the cultivation of the country must, of necessity, devolve upon women, if it is done at all; we have seen men directing gangs of women in the field, as it is said drivers superintend gangs of negroes on some of our southern plantations. When there, France was a republic; and yet soldiers were met every where. The people willed a republic, and legions of armed men were needed to induce the people to respect it! What a riddle are the French people.

Building in the Scotch Highlands.

The manners and customs of the Highlanders in the neighborhood of the Queen's residence are, we need hardly say, most peculiar; but their obstinate adherence to the "old way" of doing everything, is their most remarkable feature. They build now precisely in the same way they built in the time of Wallace. If they are to construct an edifice in the present day, they utterly disdain the erection of anything like a scaffolding, and reject with contempt the use of ropes, pulleys, blocks, the windlass or the crane, and, in short, any of the modern appliances which science has devised for the saving of labor. It will scarcely be credited by our readers, that her Majesty's new castle at Balmoral is being built at this moment in the manner we describe. Scaffolding there is none. Every square piece of granite is carried singly on a Highlander's back, up a narrow, zigzag platform, supported on tressels, and is deposited by him where it is to be placed. If a large block for the foundation is to be conveyed from the quarry, stout poles are placed under it, and, with four Highlanders on each side, it is carried to its destination. A wagon, with a team of horses, is a thing unknown; but it is astonishing the weights the men can transport. The pieces of granite are from two to three feet long, and proportionately thick; one of these is placed between the man's shoulders, which are protected by coarse, thick sackcloth, and, with his hands behind him, supporting the weight, he bends forward, and moves up the narrow inclined plane with an ease and celerity which are perfectly marvelous. In this primitive way, her Majesty's new castle at Balmoral is now being built, but, at the same time, we are bound to admit that it will be a most beautiful edifice.

The Preservation of Eggs for Winter Use.

The great secret, then, of preserving eggs, is to keep the interior in an unaltered state. This is best done by lime-water, in which a little common salt is infused. This constitutes a fluid perfectly indestructible by air, and one that is so allied to the nature of the shell as not to be absorbed by it, or through it into the interior of the egg. On the other hand, salt or lime in a dry state will act on the moisture of the egg, as will strong ashes. This plan, also, will save more eggs in a given space than any other. It will also admit of keeping them in cellars ever so damp, and I had almost said ever so foul, since nothing will be likely to act on the lime-water. As eggs are very nearly of the specific gravity of water, I have little doubt that eggs barreled up tightly in lime-water could be transported quite as safely as pork.

Lime-water may be made in the most careless manner. Seven hundred pounds of water will dissolve about one pound of lime. A pint of lime, therefore, thrown into a barrel of water, is enough, while ten times as much can do no hurt, and will not alter the strength of it. The salt, which I do not deem very important, should be used in small quantities, say a quart to a barrel. All are aware that a very large quantity of salt may be dissolved in water. Brine strong enough for pork would undoubtedly hurt eggs.

Having made your lime-water—in barrels if you are a merchant, and in a stone pot if you are a small house-holder—drop your eggs on the top of the water, and they will settle down safely. It is probably important that no bad eggs go in, as it is supposed by some that it would injure others. To test your eggs, put them in clean water; reject all that rise. A better remedy is to look at them through a tube—say a roll of paper—by daylight, or between your eye and a candle by night. If the eggs are fresh, they will in either case look transparent. If they are a little injured, they will look darkish; if they are much injured, they will look entirely dark.

Eggs put up in this manner will keep I cannot tell how long, but until they are much more plenty and cheaper than at present—quite long enough.

Leached ashes, well dried, and even grain, have kept eggs very well, in my experience, but no method is so obvious and cheap as the lime-water. As lime absorbs carbonic acid slowly, and thus becomes insoluble, so almost any lime, even though it has been slacked for months, will answer the purpose. Lime-water permitted to stand still, will immediately become covered with a transparent film. This is the lime of the water uniting with the carbonic acid of the atmosphere, and returning to the state of limestone, and does not hurt the eggs. [Country Gentleman.

Value of Leaves.

Payen and Boussingault give analyses of leaves from several different trees. Taking the average of all their analyses, leaves contain 1.13 per cent. of nitrogen, while farm yard dung contains only 0.41 per cent. In all vegetable or animal substances that will decompose readily, their true manurial value is in direct proportion to the amount of nitrogen they contain. Hence, leaves are worth three times as much as common barn-yard manure.

But we need not dwell on the theoretical value of leaves. Every gardener knows, from observation and experience, that nothing makes such a valuable compost as the leaves and other rubbish of the orchard and garden. This is owing partly to their chemical composition, and partly to their absorbent properties. Their porosity is so great that they will condense and retain large quantities of ammoniacal gas, and thus prevent its escape from the decomposing compost.

Every fruit grower and gardener, not to say every farmer, should rake up all the leaves on his premises and make them into a compost with seedless weeds and manure, covering the heap with a coat of loamy soil, and saturating it, during winter, with soap suds, &c., from the house. In the spring he will have spit manure of great value for garden crops.

Slaves in Russia.

Of the fifty-three and a half millions of people which Russia contained in 1842, not less than forty-two millions were slaves; of these, fifteen millions were slaves of the Crown, or the Emperor! The Russian slaves have no legal rights; in that they are no better than the negroes of the Southern States. The Russian people are not only slaves to their nobles, but they are slaves to the soil. The land of Russia is valueless of itself; its value consists in the human property belonging to it, and from which the nobles derive their chief revenue. Practically, the private serf of Russia—and there are above forty millions of such—is, life and limb, at the disposal of its owner, as completely as slaves have ever been in any country, he can be sold and hired out as a beast of burden. The law, it is true, now wills that a certain portion of the land must be sold with him; but the land in Russia is, as we have said, of mere nominal value. The master may remove one or all of his slaves for life from one estate to another, though thousands of miles apart. In purchasing a slave, he has only to go through the formality of receiving from the former owner a few acres with him, of which he soon forgets the possession, and from which he may remove the slave, separating him forever from his wife and children, and dooming him to perpetual banishment from his home.

The Russian slaves, male or female, cannot marry without the permission of their owner; and, as in the case of negroes in the Southern States, there are no purposes, even the most infamous, to which the female slave is not liable to be devoted, and frequently applied. The master may at any time send his male slave to Siberia, or for a soldier—and some he must constantly choose for this service. The owner may flog his slave to death, but the law only permits him to be fined. The law forbids any court to receive the evidence of the slave against his master. By a royal ukase issued by the monster Catharine, and since confirmed by Nicholas, if a serf makes any complaint to his superior against his lord, "he shall be amenable to the punishment which the laws award,"—that is, to the punishment of death! But there is no law in Russia except the despotic will of the head slave owner. Puschkin, the Russian writer, emphatically observes, "There is no law in Russia; the law is nailed to a stake, and that steak wears the crown."

A Beautiful Picture.

The man who stands upon his own soil, who feels that by the laws of the land in which he lives—by the laws of civilized nations—he is the rightful and exclusive owner of the land which he tills, is by the constitution of our nature under a wholesome influence not easily imbibed from any other source. He feels, other things being equal, more strongly than another the character of a man as lord of the inanimate world. Of this great and wonderful sphere, which, fashioned by the hand of God, and upheld by his power, is rolling thro' the heavens, a part is his—his from the center sky. It is the space on which the generation before moved in its round of duties, and he feels himself connected by a visible link with those who follow him, and to whom he is to transmit a home. Perhaps his farm has come down to him from his fathers. They have gone to their last home! but he can trace their footsteps over the scenes of his daily labors. The roof that shelters him was reared by those to whom he owes his being. Some interesting domestic tradition is connected with every enclosure. The favorite fruit tree was planted by his father's hand. He sported in boyhood beside the brook which still winds through the meadow. Through the field lies the path to the village school of earlier days. He still hears from his window the voice of the Sabbath bell which called his father to the house of God; and near at hand is the spot where his parents laid down to rest, and where, when his time has come, he shall be laid by his children. These are the feelings of the owners of the soil. Words cannot paint them, gold cannot buy them; they flow out of the deepest fountains of the heart, they are the life-springs of a fresh, healthy, and generous national character. [Edward Everett.

Self-made Men.

"If you are to be an exception," said Mr. Crabbe to his young friend, "you will be the first in all my observation and experience. You may take the whole population of Maryland, and select from it the fifty men who are most distinguished for talent, or any description of public usefulness, and I will answer for it, they are all, every one of them, men who began the world without a dollar. Look into the public councils of the nation, and who are they who take the lead there? They are men who made their own fortunes—self-made men, who began with nothing. The rule is universal. It pervades our courts, State and Federal, from the highest to the lowest. It is true of all the professions. It is so now; it has been so at any time since I have known the public men of this State or the Nation; and it will be so while our present institutions continue. You must throw a man on his own resources to bring him out. The struggle which is to result in eminence is too arduous, and must be continued too long, to be encountered and maintained voluntarily, or unless as a matter of life and death. He who has fortune to fall back upon will soon slacken from his efforts, and finally retire from the competition. With me it is a question whether it is desirable that a parent should be able to leave his son any property at all. You will have a large fortune, and I am sorry for it, as it will be the spoiling of a good lawyer. These are my deliberate sentiments, and I shall be rejoiced to find, in your instance, I shall have been mistaken.

American State Papers.

The London News pays the following handsome compliment to American statesmanship:

"From the time of Alexander Hamilton to that of Edward Everett, the reports and correspondence sent out by Congressional Committees and heads of departments have been of such singular merit as to fix the attention of society in Europe, wherever the English language is familiarly read. The wonder is less, to persons familiar with the structure and workings of the American Government, than to those who know only European ways. The statesmen at Washington are usually educated gentlemen and men of business at once—usually professional men, who yet have had occasion, in the course of their lives, to do with their own hands much of the real business of life; and there is nothing like that sort of experience, when combined with a liberal education, for enabling men to take and express sound and clear views of political subjects. Webster used to say that he did business all the better for having taken his father's horse to water, before he went to college; and Clay boasted of his manual toils as one of the chief preparations of his statesmanship. Chosen from among the people, the great officers of Government know how to address the popular mind, and the popular mind in America, when dispassionate, is a mind of high order."

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE PRINTING PRESS.—The Paterson (N. J.) Guardian describes an important improvement of the press, recently invented by Mr. D. Baldwin, of Godwinville, called the Press Feeder, and designed to supply the press with blank sheets. The model is a self-operative one, and takes up one sheet at a time, at the surprising rate of 7,000 per hour. The manner of taking hold of the paper is truly ingenious, and works with the greatest simplicity. The apparatus consists of a horizontal tube, to which are joined several small vertical ones; the whole, thus arranged, are given reciprocating motion from the pile of paper to the main cylinder of the press. Connected with these tubes is an air-pump to exhaust them of the air they contain. As the tubes are made to pass over the pile of paper, the pump in its turn exhausts the main tube, and the air immediately rushing in at the lower end of the smaller tubes to supply the vacuum thus formed, draws with it the top sheet of the pile, which, by the external pressure of the atmosphere, is held permanently against the face of the small vertical tubes. The sheet, thus secured, is drawn forward to the cylinder, when the pump is reversed and the sheet of paper is discharged where it receives the impression. The tubes immediately return to their former position for another sheet, and in succession till the whole pile of paper is worked off. This invention bids fair to dispense with a large amount of manual labor, and strongly recommends itself, from great simplicity and certainty in its working parts.

NEW RAILROAD BRAKE.—Capt. Sylvanus Bennet exhibited on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 26, at Woodruff's office, No. 63 Wall-street, New York, a working model of a new plan for stopping cars, operating without brakemen, and wholly at the will of the Engineer, by which the brakes can be applied to every wheel in the same space of time now required to send the alarm to brakemen on the cars by the whistle. Capt. Bennet thinks that he can stop a heavy train of cars going at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour in a space of about one hundred feet; and going at forty miles an hour, in a space of three hundred feet. The principle is very simple. The brakes are applied to the whole train by merely stopping the engine, or by turning the little hand-wheel on the end of any one car. Two cars butting together by any cause will apply the brakes to both. A rod which is coupled with the cars runs under the whole train, which, being shoved back, drives a wedge under the arm of the brake levers, which close a band upon the outer edge of the wheel two-thirds of its circumference. The act of starting the engine relieves the brakes of all the cars instantly. There is also a very simple arrangement for throwing the brakes out of gear when it is necessary to back, still leaving them to be applied by hand just as well with that motion as a forward one. Upon horse cars it can be so arranged that the stopping of the team will put the brakes hard down in an instant.

CAUSES OF CRIME.—Of 240 convicts confined in the Tennessee Penitentiary, 38 were temperate before sentence, and 202 intemperate; and 127 were drunk when they committed crime. There are 43 whose fathers were temperate, 197 whose fathers were intemperate, of whom 72 were common drunkards. There are three who have had a classical education, seven of a common English education, 105 who can read and write, 62 who can read only, and 63 who can neither read nor write. These statistics show clearly that intemperance and the want of education are the two most fruitful sources of crime.

HOW TO WEAR SPECTACLES.—The following is copied from a 'Treatise on the Eye,' by Mr. West, an eminent optician:—

"In the proper use of spectacles, there is no circumstance of more importance than their position on the head. They should be worn so that the glasses may come as close to the eyes as possible, without touching the eyelashes. They should also be placed so that the glasses may be parallel to the paper when the head is in an easy position. To accomplish this, let the sides of the spectacles bear on the head about midway between the top of it and the ear; the eyes will then look directly through the glasses to the paper, and make the most advantageous use of them, instead of looking obliquely through them to the paper, as spectacles are usually worn, with their bows in contact with the ear in which position they produce a distorted image on the retina. The sides of the spectacles should also be placed at an equal height upon the head."

NOW AND THEN.—In 1741 a Boston newspaper contained the following advertisement:

"To be sold by the printer of this paper, the very best Negro Woman in this town, who has had the small pox and the measles; is as hearty as a horse, as brisk as a bird, and will work like a beaver.

"To be sold by the printer of this paper, a Negro Man, about 30 years old, who can do both town and country business very well, but will suit the country best, where they have not so many dram-shops as we have in Boston. He has worked at the printing business 15 or 16 years; can handle axe, saw, spade, hoe, or other implement of industry, as well as most men, and values himself and is valued by others, for his skill in cookery."

Times have changed. The "Old Bay State" has long since abjured the sin of slavery. Boston has become the hot-bed of abolitionism.

MASSACHUSETTS OXEN.—At the Western Hampden Agricultural Fair, there were 50 yoke of Oxen exhibited, the average weight of which was 3,594 pounds to the pair. The following figures show the separate weights of pairs: Daniel Munson, 4,600, 4,290, 3,800, 3,450, 3,120; Seth Bush, 4,500, 4,090, 3,840, 3,740, 3,620, 3,420; George Taylor, 4,190, 3,990; Charles Fowler, 4,000, 3,880, 3,880, 3,690, 3,530, 3,200; William Noble, 3,800, 3,450, 3,770, 3,070; Hezekiah Taylor, 3,690, 3,660, 3,160, 3,540, 3,350, 3,040; Luke Bush, 3,850, 3,190; George H. Mosely, 3,780, 3,610, 3,440; Elijah Owen, 3,450, 3,450, 3,400, 3,230; Wm. Squier, 3,350; Roswell King, 3,230; Town of Westfield, 3,280; Elijah Sibley, 4,000, West Springfield; Abner Moore, 3,800, 3,590, 3,190, Montgomery; Oliver Moore, 3,380, 3,180, do.; Moses Moore, 3,300, do.; Wm. Herrick, 3,280, do.; O. Moore, 3,230, do. One pair not embraced in the above, by Mr. Luke Bush, estimated at 5,500 pounds.

THE SWEARING ROOM.—The Baltimore Sun says: "A day or two since, a genteelly dressed man, and having all the appearance of a gentleman, walked into the bar-room of one of our most respectable hotels, and perhaps by way of showing his consequence, strutted about the room, asking questions, and interlarding his language with any amount of oaths, especially annoying to the landlord and several other persons present. The landlord at last went to him, and quietly calling him aside, told him that the language he was using was exceedingly disagreeable in that place; further, that there was a private room, particularly fitted up, which was called the "swearing room," and if he would only go there he might swear to his heart's content. The stranger took the rebuke kindly, and no more swearing was heard from his lips at that time."

VARIETY.

Since the discovery of gold in California six hundred ships have gone round Cape Horn into the Pacific, which have not returned. Some were broken up at San Francisco, and some found employment in the Pacific. The abstraction of this large fleet from the Atlantic Ocean, is one of the causes of the activity which has prevailed in ship yards during the last few years.

In connection with the death of Arago, it has been noted as a singular fact, that not a single member of the Provisional Government was present at the funeral of their colleague. Lamartine, Dupont and Garnier Pages were absent from Paris; Ledru Rollin, Louis Blanc and Flocon are in exile; Alberti is in a political prison, and Marrast is dead.

It is stated that the number upon whom the title of D.D. has been conferred by the American Colleges this past year, is ninety-eight, Bishop Davis, of South Carolina, having received it from two different sources. The number blessed with the LL. D. is fifty-one, President Pierce, Governor Clifford of Massachusetts, and Judge Campbell of the Supreme Court, being thrice blessed.

The proprietors of the Cumberland Iron Works, on Cumberland River, Tennessee, have engaged the services of twenty Chinese coolies, as iron workers. They are expected to arrive shortly at Cincinnati, from whence they will be forwarded to their destination. It is said that the Chinese are very expert in working iron.

If we work on marble, it will perish; if we work upon brass, time will efface it; if we rear temples, they will crumble to the dust. But if we work upon immortal minds—if we imbue them with high principles, with the fear of God and of their fellow-men, we engrave on those tablets something which no time can efface, but which will brighten to all eternity.

London extends over an area of seventy-eight thousand and twenty-nine acres, or one hundred and twenty-two square miles; and the number of its inhabitants, rapidly increasing, was two millions three hundred and sixty-two thousand two hundred and thirty-six, on the day of the last census.

Bells! Bells! Bells!

THE Subscribers manufacture and keep constantly on hand all sizes of Church, Factory, Steamboat, Ferry, Locomotive, School House, and Plantation Bells. These Bells are hung with the patent iron yokes with moveable arms. They can be turned around so that the clapper will strike in a new place, which is desirable after a bell has been rung a few years. Springs are affixed in a new way to prevent the clapper from resting on the Bell, thereby prolonging the sound. These Bells are manufactured from the best stock and are cast in iron casings. At this Foundry these were first used and are found to be a great improvement. We give a written warrantee that if Church Bells break within one year from date of purchase, with fair usage, we will recast without charge. The tone of all Bells is warranted. Nearly 9000 Bells have been cast and sold from this Foundry, which is the best evidence of their superiority. We have 15 Gold and Silver Medals, awarded from the various Fairs "for the best Bells for sonorousness and purity of tone." We pay particular attention to getting up Peals or Chimes, and can refer to those furnished by us. Our Foundry is within a few rods of the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Railroads running in every direction. As this is the largest Establishment of the kind in the U. S. and has the largest assortment of Bells, orders can be filled with great dispatch. We can refer to Bells in any of the States. Old Bells taken in exchange for new ones. Levels, Compasses, &c., constantly on hand. Address,

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:—

The interest with which the people of the Republic anticipate the assembling of Congress, and the fulfillment, on that occasion, of the duty imposed upon a new President, is one of the best evidences of their capacity to realize the hopes of the founders of a political system, at once complex and symmetrical. While the different branches of the Government are, to a certain extent, independent of each other, the duties of all, alike, have direct reference to the source of power. Fortunately, under this system, no man is so high, and none so humble, in the scale of public station, as to escape from the scrutiny, or to be exempt from the responsibility, which all official functions imply.

Upon the justice and intelligence of the masses, in a Government thus organized, is the sole reliance of the Confederacy, and the only security for honest and earnest devotion to its interests, against the usurpations and encroachments of power on one hand, and the assaults of personal ambition on the other.

The interest, of which I have spoken, is inseparable from an inquiring, self-governing community, but stimulated, doubtless, at the present time, by the unsettled condition of our relations with several foreign powers; by the new obligations resulting from a sudden extension of the field of enterprise; by the spirit with which that field has been entered, and the amazing energy with which its resources for meeting the demands of humanity have been developed.

Although disease, assuming at one time the characteristics of a wide-spread and devastating pestilence, has left its sad traces upon some portions of our country, we have still the most abundant cause for reverent thankfulness to God for an accumulation of signal mercies showered upon us as a Nation. It is well that a consciousness of rapid advancement and increasing strength be habitually associated with an abiding sense of dependence upon Him who holds in his hands the destiny of men and of Nations.

Recognizing the wisdom of the broad principle of absolute religious toleration proclaimed in our fundamental law, and rejoicing in the benign influence which it has exerted upon our social and political condition, I should shrink from a clear duty, did I fail to express my deepest conviction, that we can place no secure reliance upon any apparent progress, if it be not sustained by national integrity, resting upon the great truths affirmed and illustrated by Divine Revelation. In the midst of our sorrow for the afflicted and suffering, it has been consoling to see how promptly disaster made true neighbors of districts and cities separated widely from each other, and cheering to watch the strength of that common bond of brotherhood, which unites all hearts, in all parts of this Union, when dangers threatens from abroad, or calamity impends over us at home.

Our diplomatic relations with foreign powers have undergone no essential change since the adjournment of the last Congress. With some of them questions of a disturbing character are still pending, but there are good reasons to believe that these may all be amicably adjusted.

For some years past, Great Britain has so construed the first article of the Convention of the 20th of April, 1818, in regard to the fisheries on the north-eastern coast, as to exclude our citizens from some of the fishing grounds, to which they freely resorted for nearly a quarter of a century subsequent to the date of that treaty. The United States have never acquiesced in this construction, but have always claimed for their fishermen all the rights which they had so long enjoyed without molestation. With a view to remove all difficulties on the subject, to extend the rights of our fishermen beyond the limits fixed by the Convention of 1818, and to regulate trade between the United States and the British North American Provinces, a negotiation has been opened, with a fair prospect of a favorable result. To protect our fishermen in the enjoyment of their rights, and prevent collision between them and British fishermen, I deemed it expedient to station a naval force in that quarter during the fishing season.

Embarrassing questions have also arisen between the two Governments in regard to Central America. Great Britain has proposed to settle them by an amicable arrangement, and our Minister at London is instructed to enter into negotiations on that subject.

A Commission for adjusting the claims of our citizens against Great Britain, and those of British subjects against the United States, organized under the Convention of the 8th of February last, is now sitting in London for the transaction of business.

It is in many respects desirable that the boundary line between the United States and the British Provinces in the north-west, as designated in the Convention of the 15th of June, 1846, and especially that part which separates the Territory of Washington from the British possessions on the north, should be traced and marked. I therefore present the subject to your notice.

With France our relations continue on the most friendly footing. The extensive commerce between the United States and that country, might, it is conceived, be released from some unnecessary restrictions, to the mutual advantage of both parties. With a view to this object, some progress has been made in negotiating a treaty of commerce and navigation.

Independently of our valuable trade with Spain, we have important political relations with her, growing out of our neighborhood to the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. I am happy to announce, that since the last Congress no attempts have been made, by unauthorized expeditions within the United States, against either of these Colonies. Should any movement be manifested within our limits, all the means at my command will be vigorously exerted to repress it. Several annoying occurrences have taken place at Havana, or in the vicinity of the island of Cuba, between our citizens and the Spanish authorities. Considering the proximity of that island to our shores—lying as it does, in the track of trade between some of our principal cities —and the suspicious vigilance with which foreign intercourse, particularly that with the United States, is there guarded, a repetition of such occurrences may well be apprehended. As no diplomatic intercourse is allowed between our Consul at Havana and the Captain-General of Cuba, ready explanations cannot be made, or prompt redress afforded, where injury has resulted. All complaint on the part of our citizens, under the present arrangement, must be, in the first place, presented to this Government, and then referred to Spain. Spain again refers it to her local authorities in Cuba for investigation, and postpones an answer till she has heard from those authorities. To avoid these irritating and vexatious delays, a proposition has been made to provide for a direct appeal for redress to the Captain-General by our Consul, in behalf of our injured fellow-citizens. Hitherto, the Government of Spain has declined to enter into any such arrangement. This course on her part is deeply regretted; for, without some arrangement of this kind, the good understanding between the two countries may be exposed to occasional interruption. Our Minister at Madrid is instructed to renew the proposition, and to press it again upon the consideration of her Catholic Majesty's Government.

For several years Spain has been calling the attention of this Government to a claim for losses, by some of her subjects, in the case of the schooner Amistad. This claim is believed to rest on the obligations imposed by our existing treaty with that country. Its justice was admitted, in our diplomatic correspondence with the Spanish Government, as early as March, 1847; and one of my predecessors, in his annual Message of that year, recommended that provision should be made for its payment. In January last it was again submitted to Congress by the Executive. It has received a favorable consideration by Committees of both branches, but as yet there has been no final action upon it. I conceive that good faith requires its prompt adjustment, and I present it to your early and favorable consideration.

Martin Koszta, a Hungarian by birth, came to this country in 1850, and declared his intention, in due form of law, to become a citizen of the United States. After remaining here nearly two years, he visited Turkey. While at Smyrna, he was forcibly seized, taken on board an Austrian brig of war, then lying in the harbor of that place, and there confined in irons, with the avowed design to take him into the dominions of Austria. Our Consul at Smyrna and Legation at Constantinople interposed for his release, but their efforts were ineffectual. While thus imprisoned, Commander Ingraham, with the United States ship of war St. Louis, arrived at Smyrna, and, after inquiring into the circumstances of the case, came to the conclusion that Koszta was entitled to the protection of this Government, and took energetic and prompt measures for his release. Under an arrangement between the agents of the United States and of Austria, he was transferred to the custody of the French Consul-General, at Smyrna, there to remain until he should be disposed of by the mutual agreement of the Consuls of the respective Governments at that place. Pursuant to that agreement he has been released and is now in the United States. The Emperor of Austria has made the conduct of our officers who took part in this transaction a subject of grave complaint. Regarding Koszta as still his subject, and claiming a right to seize him within the limits of the Turkish Empire, he has demanded of this Government its consent to the surrender of the prisoner, a disavowal of the acts of its agents, and satisfaction for the alledged outrage. After a careful consideration of the case, I came to the conclusion that Koszta was seized without legal authority at Smyrna; that he was wrongfully detained on board of the Austrian brig of war; that, at the time of his seizure, he was clothed with the nationality of the United States; and that the acts of our officers, under the circumstances of the case, were justifiable, and their conduct has been fully approved by me, and a compliance with the several demands of the Emperor of Austra has been declined.

For a more full account of this transaction and my views in regard to it, I refer to the correspondence between the Chargé d'Affaires of Austria and the Secretary of State, which is herewith transmitted. The principles and policy, therein maintained on the part of the United States, will, whenever a proper occasion occurs, be applied and enforced.

The condition of China, at this time, renders it probable that some important changes will occur in that vast Empire, which will lead to a more unrestricted intercourse with it. The Commissioner to that country, who has been recently appointed, is instructed to avail himself of all occasions to open and extend our commercial relations, not only with the Empire of China, but with other Asiatic nations.

In 1852, an expedition was sent to Japan, under the command of Commodore Perry, for the purpose of opening commercial intercourse with that Island. Intelligence has been received of his arrival there, and of his having made known to the Emperor of Japan the object of his visit; but it is not yet ascertained how far the Emperor will be disposed to abandon his restrictive policy, and open that populous country to a commercial intercourse with the United States.

It has been my earnest desire to maintain friendly intercourse with the Governments upon this continent, and to aid them in preserving good understanding among themselves. With Mexico, a dispute has arisen as to the true boundary line between our territory of New Mexico and the Mexican State of Chihuahua. A former Commissioner of the United States, employed in running that line pursuant to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, made a serious mistake in determining the initial point on the Rio Grande; but, inasmuch as his decision was clearly a departure from the directions for tracing the boundary contained in that treaty, and was not concurred in by a surveyor appointed on the part of the United States, whose concurrence was necessary to give validity to that decision, this Government is not concluded thereby; but that of Mexico takes a different view of the subject.

There are also other questions of considerable magnitude pending between the two Republics. Our Minister in Mexico has ample instructions to adjust them. Negotiations have been opened, but sufficient progress has not been made therein to enable me to speak of the probable result. Impressed with the importance of maintaining amicable relations with that Republic, and yielding with liberality to her just claims, it is resonable to expect that an arrangement mutually satisfactory to both countries may be concluded, and a lasting friendship between them confirmed and perpetuated.

Congress having provided for a full mission to the States of Central America, a minister was sent thither in July last. As yet he has had time to visit only one of these States, (Nicaragua,) where he was received in the most friendly manner. It is hoped that his presence and good offices will have a benign effect in composing the dissensions which prevail among them, and in establishing still more intimate and friendly relations between them respectively, and between each of them and the United States.

Considering the vast regions of this continent, and the number of States which would be made accessible by the free navigation of the river Amazon, particular attention has been given to the subject. Brazil, through whose territories it passes into the ocean, has hitherto persisted in a policy so restrictive, in regard to the use of this river, as to obstruct, and nearly exclude, foreign commercial intercourse with the States which lie upon its tributaries and upper branches. Our minister to that country is instructed to obtain a relaxation of that policy, and to use his efforts to induce the Brazilian Government to open to common use, under proper safeguards, this great natural highway for international trade. Several of the South American States are deeply interested in this attempt to secure the free navigation of the Amazon, and it is reasonable to expect their coöperation in the measure. As the advantages of free commercial intercourse among nations are better understood, more liberal views are generally entertained as to the common rights of all to the free use of those means which nature has provided for international communication. To these more liberal and enlightened views, it is hoped that Brazil will conform her policy, and remove all unnecessary restrictions upon the free use of a river, which traverses so many States and so large a part of the continent. I am happy to inform you that the Republic of Paraguay and the Argentine Confederation have yielded to the liberal policy still resisted by Brazil, in regard to the navigable rivers within their respective territories. Treaties, embracing this subject among others, have been negotiated with these Governments, which will be submitted the Senate at the present session.

A new branch of commerce, important to the agricultural interests of the United States, has, within a few years past, been opened with Peru. Notwithstanding the inexhaustible deposits of guano upon the Islands of that country, considerable difficulties are experienced in obtaining the requisite supply. Measures have been taken to remove these difficulties, and to secure a more abundant importation of the article. Unfortunately, there has been a serious collision between our citizens, who have resorted to the Chincha Islands for it, and the Peruvian authorities stationed there. Redress for the outrages, committed by the latter, was promptly demanded by our Minister at Lima. This subject is now under consideration, and there is reason to believe that Peru is disposed to offer adequate indemnity to the aggrieved parties. We are thus not only at peace with all foreign countries, but in regard to political affairs, are exempt from any cause of serious disquietude in our domestic relations.

The controversies, which have agitated the country heretofore, are passing away with the causes which produced them and the passions which they had awakened, or, if any trace of them remains, it may be reasonably hoped that it will only be perceived in the zealous rivalry of all good citizens to testify their respect for the rights of the States, their devotion to the Union, and their common determination that each one of the States, its institutions, its welfare, and its domestic peace shall be held alike secure under the sacred ægis of the Constitution.

This new league of amity and of mutual confidence and support into which the people of the Republic have entered, happily affords inducement and opportunity for the adoption of a more comprehensive and unembarrassed line of policy and action, as to the great material interests of the country, whether regarded in themselves or in connection with the powers of the civilized world.

The United States have continued gradually and steadily to expand, through acquisitions of territory, which, how much soever some of them may have been questioned, are now universally seen and admitted to have been wise in policy, just in character, and a great element in the advancement of our country, and, with it, of the human race, in freedom, in prosperity, and in happiness. The thirteen States have grown to be thirty-one, with relations reaching to Europe on the one side, and on the other to the distant realms of Asia.

I am deeply sensible of the immense responsibility which the present magnitude of the Republic, and the diversity and multiplicity of its interests, devolves upon me; the alleviation of which, so far as relates to the immediate conduct of the public business is, first, in my reliance on the wisdom and patriotism of the two Houses of Congress; and, secondly, in the directions afforded me by the principles of public polity, affirmed by our fathers of the epoch of 1798, sanctioned by long experience, and consecrated anew by the overwhelming voice of the people of the United States.

Recurring to these principles, which constitute the organic basis of union, we perceive that, vast as are the functions and duties of the Federal Government, vested in, or entrusted to its three great departments, the legislative, executive, and judicial, yet the substantive power, the popular force, and the large capacities for social and material development, exist in the respective States, which, all being of themselves well constituted republics, as they preceded, so they alone are capable of maintaining and perpetuating the American Union. The Federal Government has its appropriate line of action in the specific and limited powers conferred on it by the Constitution, chiefly as to those things in which the States have a common interest in their relations to one another, and to foreign governments; while the great mass of interests which belong to cultivated men, the ordinary business of life, the springs of industry, all the diversified personal and domestic affairs of society, rest securely upon the general reserved powers of the people of the several States. There is the effective Democracy of the nation, and there the vital essence of its being and its greatness.

Of the practical consequences which flow from the nature of the Federal Government, the primary one is the duty of administering with integrity and fidelity the high trust reposed in it by the Constitution, especially in the application of the Public Funds, as drawn by taxation from the people, and appropriated to specific objects by Congress. Happily I have no occasion to suggest any radical changes in the financial policy of the Government. Ours is almost, if not absolutely, the solitary power of Christendom having a surplus revenue, drawn immediately from imposts on commerce, and therefore measured by the spontaneous enterprise and national prosperity of the country, with such indirect relation to agriculture, manufactures, and the products of the earth and sea, as to violate no constitutional doctrine, and yet vigorously promote the general welfare. Neither as to the sources of the public treasure, nor as to the manner of keeping and managing it, does any grave controversy now prevail, there being a general acquiescence in the wisdom of the present system.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury will exhibit in detail, the state of the public finances, and the condition of the various branches of the public service administered by that department of the Government.

The revenue of the country, levied almost insensibly to the tax payer, goes on from year to year increasing beyond either the interests or the prospective wants of the Government.

At the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852, there remained in the Treasury a balance of fourteen million six hundred and thirty-two thousand one hundred and thirty-six dollars. The public revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, amounted to fifty-eight million nine hundred and thirty-one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five dollars from customs, and to two million four hundred and five thousand seven hundred and eight dollars from public lands and other miscellaneous sources, amounting together to sixty-one million three hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred and seventy-four dollars; while the public expenditures for the same period, exclusive of payments on account of the public debt, amounted to forty-three million five hundred and fifty-four thousand two hundred and sixty-two dollars; leaving a balance of thirty-two million four hundred and twenty five thousand four hundren and forty-seven dollars of receipts above expenditures.

This fact, of increasing surplus in the Treasury, became the subject of anxious consideration at a very early period of my Administration, and the path of duty in regard to it seemed to me obvious and clear, namely first, to apply the surplus revenue to the discharge of the Public Debt, so far as it could judiciously be done; and, secondly, to devise means for the gradual reduction of the revenue to the standard of the public exigencies.

Of these objects, the first has been in the course of accomplishment, in a manner and to a degree highly satisfactory. The amount of the Public Debt, of all classes, was, on the 4th of March, 1853, sixty-nine million one hundred and ninety thousand and thirty-seven dollars; payments on account of which have been made, since that period, to the amount of twelve million seven hundred and three thousand three hundred and twenty-nine dollars, leaving unpaid, and in the continuous course of liquidation, the sum of fifty-six million four hundred and eighty-six thousand seven hundred and eight dollars. These payments, although made at the market price of the respective classes of stocks, have been effected readily, and to the general advantage of the Treasury, and have at the same time proved of signal utility in the relief they have incidentally afforded to the money market and to the industrial and commercial pursuits of the country.

The second of the above-mentioned objects, that of the reduction of the Tariff, is of great importance, and the plan suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, which is to reduce the duties on certain articles, and to add to the free lists many articles now taxed, and especially such as enter into manufactures, and are not largely, or at all, produced in the country, is commended to your candid and careful consideration.

You will find in the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, also, abundant proof of the entire adequacy of the present fiscal system to meet all the requirements of the public service, and that, while properly administered, it operates to the advantage of the community in ordinary business relations.

I respectfully ask your attention to sundry suggestions of improvements in the settlement of accounts, especially as regards the large sums of outstanding arrears due to the Government, and of other reforms in the administrative action of his department, which are indicated by the Secretary; as also to the progress made in the construction of Marine Hospitals, Custom Houses, and of a new Mint in California and Assay Office in the City of New York, heretofore provided for by Congress; and also to the eminently successful progress of the Coast Survey, and of the Light-House Board.

Among the objects meriting your attention will be important recommendations from the Secretaries of War and Navy. I am fully satisfied that the Navy of the United States is not in a condition of strength and efficiency commensurate with the magnitude of our commercial and other interests; and commend to your especial attention the suggestions on this subject, made by the Secretary of the Navy. I respectfully submit that the Army, which, under our system, must always be regarded with the highest interest, as a nucleus around which the volunteer forces of the nation gather in the hour of danger, requires augmentation, or modification, to adapt it to the present extended limits and frontier relations of the country, and the condition of the Indian tribes in the interior of the continent; the necessity of which will appear in the communications of the Secretaries of War and the Interior.

In the administration of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853, the gross expenditure was seven million nine hundred and eighty-two thousand seven hundred and fifty-six dollars; and the gross receipts, during the same period, five million nine hundred and forty-two thousand seven hundred and thirty-four dollars; showing that the current revenue failed to meet the current expenses of the department by the sum of two million forty-two thousand and thirty-two dollars. The causes which, under the present postal system and laws, led inevitably to this result, are fully explained by the Report of the Postmaster-General; one great cause being the enormous rates the department has been compelled to pay for mail service rendered by Railroad Companies.

The exhibit in the Report of the Postmaster-General of the income and expenditures by mail steamers will be found peculiarly interesting, and of a character to demand the immediate action of Congress.

Numerous and flagrant frauds upon the Pension Bureau have been brought to light within the past year, and, in some instances, merited punishments inflicted; but, unfortunately, in others, guilty parties have escaped, not through the want of sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction, but in consequence of the provisions of limitation in the existing laws.

From the nature of these claims, the remoteness of the tribunals to pass upon them, and the mode in which the proof is, of necessity furnished, temptations to crime have been greatly stimulated by the obvious difficulties of detection. The defects in the law upon this subject are so apparent and so fatal to the ends of justice, that your early action relating to it is most desirable.

During the last fiscal year, nine million eight hundred and nineteen thousand four hundred and eleven acres of the public lands have been surveyed, and ten million three hundred and sixty-three thousand eight hundred and ninety-one acres brought into market. Within the same period the sales by public purchase and private entry amounted to one million eighty-three thousand four hundred and ninety-five acres; located under military bounty land warrants, six million one hundred and forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty acres; located under other certificates, nine thousand four hundred and twenty-seven acres; ceded to the State as swamp lands, sixteen million six hundred and eighty-four thousand two hundred and fifty-three acres; selected for railroad and other objects, under acts of Congress, one million four hundred and twenty-seven thousand four hundred and fifty-seven acres. Total amount of lands disposed of, within the fiscal year, twenty-five million three hundred and forty-six thousand nine hundred and ninety-two acres—which is an increase in quantity sold and located under land warrants and grants, of twelve million two hundred and thirty-one thousand eight hundred and eighteen acres over the fiscal year immediately preceding. The quantity of land sold during the second and third quarters of 1852, was three hundred and thirty-four thousand four hundred and fifty-one acres. The amount received therefor was six hundred and twenty-three thousand six hundred and eighty-seven dollars. The quantity sold the second and third quarters of the year 1853, was one million six hundred and nine thousand nine hundred and nineteen acres; and the amount received therefor, two million two hundred and twenty-six thousand eight hundred and seventy-six dollars.

The whole number of land warrants issued under existing laws, prior to the 30th of September last, was two hundred and sixty-six thousand and forty-two; of which there were outstanding, at that date, sixty-six thousand nine hundred and forty-seven. The quantity of land required to satisfy these outstanding warrants is four million seven hundred and seventy-eight thousand one hundred and twenty acres.

Warrants have been issued to 30th of September last, under the act of 11th February, 1847, calling for twelve million eight hundred and seventy-nine thousand two hundred and eighty acres; under acts of September 28, 1850, and March 22, 1852, calling for twelve million five hundred and five thousand three hundred and sixty acres—making a total of twenty-five million three hundred and eighty-four thousand six hundred and forty acres.

It is believed that experience has verified the wisdom and justice of the present system, with regard to the public domain, in most essential particulars.

You will perceive, from the Report of the Secretary of the Interior, that opinions, which have often been expressed in relation to the operation of the land system, as not being a source of revenue to the Federal Treasury, were erroneous. The net profits from the sale of the public lands to June 30, 1853, amouuted to the sum of fifty-three million two hundred and eighty-nine thousand four hundred and sixty-five dollars.

I recommend the extension of the land system over the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, with such modifications as their peculiarities may require.

Regarding our public domain as chiefly valuable to provide homes for the industrious and enterprising, I am not prepared to recommend any essential change in the land system, except by modifications in favor of the actual settler, and an extension of the preëmption principle in certain cases, for reasons and on grounds which will be fully developed in the reports to be laid before you.

Congress, representing the proprietors of the territorial domain, and charged especially with power to dispose of territory belonging to the United States, has, for a long course of years, beginning with the administration of Mr. Jefferson, exercised the power to construct roads within the Territories; and there are so many and obvious distinctions between this exercise of power and that of making roads within the States, that the former has never been considered subject to such objections as apply to the latter, and such may now be considered the settled construction of the power of the Federal Government upon the subject.

Numerous applications have been, and no doubt will continue to be made for grants of land, in aid of the construction of railways. It is not believed to be within the intent and meaning of the Constitution, that the power to dispose of the public domain should be used otherwise than might be expected from a prudent proprietor, and, therefore, that grants of land to aid in the construction of roads should be restricted to cases where it would be for the interest of a proprietor, under like circumstances, thus to contribute to the construction of these works. For the practical operation of such grants thus far, in advancing the interests of the States in which the works are located, and at the same time the substantial interests of all the other States by enhancing the value and promoting the rapid sale of the public domain, I refer you to the Report of the Secretary of the Interior. A careful examination, however, will show that this experience is the result of a just discrimination, and will be far from affording encouragement to a reckless or indiscriminate extension of the principle.

I commend to your favorable consideration the men of genius of our country, who, by their inventions and discoveries in science and art, have contributed largely to the improvements of the age, without, in many instances, securing for themselves anything like an adequate reward. For many interesting details upon this subject I refer you to the appropriate Reports, and especially urge upon your early attention the apparently slight, but really important modifications of existing laws therein suggested.

The liberal spirit which has so long marked the action of Congress in relation to the District of Columbia, will, I have no doubt, continue to be manifested.

The erection of an asylum for the insane of the District of Columbia, and of the Army and Navy of the United States, has been somewhat retarded; but full preparation for the reception of patients, before the return of another winter, is anticipated; and there is the best reason to believe, from the plan and contemplated arrangements which have been devised, with the large experience furnished within the last few years in relation to the nature and treatment of the disease, that it will prove an asylum indeed to this most helpless and afflicted class of sufferers, and stand as a noble monument of wisdom and mercy.

Under the acts of Congress of Aug. 31, 1852, and of March 3, 1853, designed to secure for the cities of Washington and Georgetown an abundant supply of good and wholesome water, it became my duty to examine the report and plans of the engineer who had charge of the surveys under the act first named. The best, if not the only plan, calculated to secure permanently the object sought, was that which contemplates taking the water from the Great Falls of the Potomac, and, consequently, I gave it my approval.

For the progress and present condition of this important work, and for its demands, so far as appropriations are concerned, I refer you to the Report of the Secretary of War.

The present judicial system of the United States has only been in operation for so long a period of time, and has, in its general theory and much of its details, become so familiar to the country, and acquired so entirely the public confidence, that if modified in any respect, it should only be in those particulars which may adapt it to the increased extent, population, and legal business of the United States. In this relation, the organization of the Courts is now confessedly inadequate to the duties to be performed by them; in consequence of which, the States of Florida, Wisconsin, Iowa, Texas, and California, and districts of other States are in effect excluded from the full benefits of the general system, by the functions of the Circuit Court being devolved on the District Judges in all those States, or parts of States.

The spirit of the Constitution and a due regard to justice require that all the States of the Union should be placed on the same footing in regard to the judicial tribunals. I therefore commend to your consideration this important subject, which, in my judgment, demands the speedy action of Congress. I will present to you, if deemed desirable, a plan, which I am prepared to recommend, for the enlargement and modification of the present judicial system.

The act of Congress establishing the Smithsonian Institution provided that the President of the United States, and other persons therein designated, should constitute an "establishment" by that name, and that the members should hold stated and special meetings for the supervision of the affairs of the Institution. The organization not having taken place, it seemed to me proper that it should be effected without delay. This has been done; and an occasion was thereby presented for inspecting the condition of the Institution, and appreciating its successful progress thus far, and

REV. I. J. ROBERTS—A CLOUDY PROSPECT.

The attention of our readers has been called to the movement of the Rev. Mr. Roberts, Baptist missionary in China, in connection with the extraordinary revolution now progressing in that country. They will, doubtless, be glad to know something of the former history of a man thus suddenly rendered conspicuous.

Issachar J. Roberts was a student at the Furman Theological Institute, Edgefield, S. C.; and while there, his mind became exercised upon the subject of Missions. His exercises finally resulted in a conviction, that he was called to preach the word of the Lord in China. Having come to this conclusion, he began to look out for a way and means to go.

In the fall of 1834 a Convention of Western Baptist Churches was held in Cincinnati, the object of which was, among other things, (if we remember rightly,) the promotion of the missionary spirit more extensively among the churches of the Great Valley of the Mississippi. Among the resolutions adopted by that body was one, recommending to the Baptists of the Mississippi Valley to furnish to the Baptist Board of Foreign Missions the means requisite to sustain a Baptist Mission in China.

Mr. Roberts' attention being calling to this resolution, he determined at the next meeting of the Convention to offer himself as a candidate for the mission in China. Accordingly, in 1835, he appeared before that body, and submitted a lengthy paper, detailing his exercises upon the subject of missions in general, and upon the proposed mission to China particularly, accompanied with sundry letters of recommendation from various persons and churches in Kentucky, South Carolina, and Mississippi.

The Western Convention was a mere Association of brethren, and could take no action in the case; the case was therefore passed to the Foreign Board, located in Boston, and this body rejected Mr. R.'s application. He had a thousand acres of land in Mississippi, valued then at $6,000. He offered to the Boston Board, or any other Baptist organization, this land as a permanent mission fund, provided they would add $6,000 more to it, and send him to China upon the interest of it.

The extraordinary spirit of speculation which spread all over the country about this time, giving a fictitious value to real estate, raised the value of his land to $25,000. He proposed selling it, establishing a permanent mission fund out of the proceeds, to be conducted by a Board of Trustees, and going to China as a missionary, sustained by the interest of this fund under the direction of said Trustees. In pursuance of his plan, the Roberts Fund and China Mission Society was organized in the city of Louisville on the 10th of May, 1836, and on the 15th of the same month he was solemnly set apart as a missionary to China, in presence of a large assembly of people. A subscription of over $1,000 for his support was taken on the occasion.

By collections, and loans by Mr. R., a sum sufficient, as was supposed, for outfit, &c., for one year was raised; and he immediately began to prepare for leaving the country on his contemplated mission. He arrived at Macao in the spring of 1837.

As his land yielded no rent, and under his instructions could not be sold before the spring of 1837, funds for his support had to be raised by contributions from the churches. He had been assured that he could as easily get $30,000 for his land in the spring of 1837, as he could the offered $25,000 in the summer of 1836; and the Board was therefore restricted from selling until the following spring, when the terrible monetary crash came upon the country, and the lands fell beyond the possibility of sale; so that he was left to subsist by the contributions of the churches. But notwithstanding this discouragement, the contributions of his friends and his own energy served to sustain him in China, and to enable him to purchase a lot and build a chapel. About two years afterward, however, he was received as a missionary of the Boston Board, and continued in this relation until about the time of the formation of the Southern Board, when he became a missionary of that body.

The foregoing account we have condensed from an article in the Tennessee Baptist by the Rev. Wm. C. Buck, one of Mr. R.'s earliest friends and supporters. The Baptist speaks of Mr. R. as "one who has sacrificed more, labored more, and suffered more, than any missionary to a foreign field was ever called upon to undergo"—though in what respects he has been such a sufferer, we are not informed. We could wish, that his martyr spirit might be evinced in trying to establish the great Chinese Empire in the observance of the Bible Sabbath, whether it were "the day most generally observed throughout Christendom," or not. But alas! he is on "the any-day system, provided it be the most popular day." (See Mr. Carpenter's Letter in last week's Recorder.)

The any-day system! A system which goes on the supposition, that God has not enjoined the observance of any one day in particular, but left his people to agree as they best can! A system which blots out the commemorative character of the Sabbath entirely, so that it is neither a memorial of Creation, as it would be, if its observance were restricted to the seventh, nor a memorial of Redemption, as it would be if its observance were restricted to the first day of the week! Yet the very persons who advocate this system, will tell us that we ought to keep Sunday, because the work of Redemption is far greater than that of Creation!

But, leaving our First-day brethren to get along with their inconsistencies as they best can, we have a word to our own people. Here is a most remarkable dispensation of Providence. In the midst of a heathen Empire, and in a part unvisited by Christian missionaries, springs up a band of reformers. They declare war against the idolatry of their land, they avow their belief in the religion of Jesus Christ, and they are all observers of the Bible Sabbath. Their numbers swell to eighty or a hundred thousand, as they march through the land, and still they are observers of the Bible Sabbath. They establish themselves at Nanking, their leader is declared Emperor, and no one doubts that the three hundred millions of China will soon be subjected to his sway. It seems next to certain, that all these three hundred millions—more than a quarter of the globe's population—will soon acknowledge the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath of the Lord. Messrs. Carpenter and Wardner, who have stood there alone as witnesses for the Sabbath, for the last six years, seem just about to have their hearts gladdened with the change; and the miserably contrived fraud, (we can give it no softer name,) by which other missionaries have attempted to palm off the Sunday upon their converts, as if it were the veritable seventh day enjoined in the Fourth Commandment, saying nothing to them about any change that has taken place, seems just on the point of being put away forever. The Sabbath of the Bible seems just on the eve of becoming the Sabbath of the Empire; when suddenly the scene changes. The sky that looked so bright, is suddenly clouded. The cup that was lifted to our lips, is dashed from us ere we can take the first draught.

Brethren of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, can you interpret this Providence? Can you tell why God brought the blessing so near, and then suddenly took it away? Lay your hands upon your hearts, and say if it was not because you were in a totally unfit condition to receive such a blessing. Say if it was not because you were so full of the spirit of this world, so faithless, so prayerless, so wanting in readiness to do your duty, that God could not, consistently with his own perfections, bestow the blessing upon you. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."

SKETCHES FROM NOTES OF A TOUR THROUGH VIRGINIA AND OHIO.

The Virginia Association was held on the bank of a stream called Meat-house Fork, taking its name, I was told, from the circumstance that "in an early day" some hunters had a gathering point on it, and erected a house in which to store their game, &c. It is a tributary of what is called Middle-Island River. This takes its name from the circumstance that its confluence with the Ohio is opposite the middle one of a group of islands in that river called the Three Brothers. The Church with which the Association was held, takes its name from this River, (Middle Island,) and holds its meetings sometimes at West Union, the county seat of Doddridge Co., situated on the river, and sometimes on the Meat-house Fork, near a place called New Milton. The distance between the two points is about eight miles. The members are so scattered that, to avail themselves of the benefits and comforts of frequently meeting together for worship, requires considerable effort. Yet the location of this church is more important, in some respects, than that of any other church in the Association. As the counties in Virginia are not divided into townships, a much larger proportion of business centers in the county seat than otherwise would, attaching to it a corresponding importance. Indeed, the operation of this arrangement, in many of the counties, is to make it the only town of much consequence in the county. To have an opportunity to bear a part in giving direction to morals and religion in such a locality, may be justly regarded as a high honor; and is a position involving no small responsibility. At this place, also, center the educational interests of our people in Virginia. Here, the Academy which they have undertaken to establish is located. It appears to me, that the future prosperity of our people in this region depends greatly upon the faithful and vigorous occupation of this field. If there is any place that calls more loudly than another for the concentration and vigorous action of all the influence and ability of those who profess to respect God's holy but neglected Sabbath, it is this. And if, for the want of such a concentration of influence, the position to which Providence has invited Sabbath-keepers here is neglected until others come forward and assume it, there are those upon whom a fearful weight of responsibility must fall; for, as if an eye had been directed to the emergency, an amount of talent has been developed here, perhaps superior to that of any other locality occupied by our people in the State.

Before we dispersed from the Association, I fixed West Union as the place, and the 13th of September as the time, of starting for Ohio, and arranged my visits and appointments accordingly. Bro. Jeptha F. Randolph stopped his plough to furnish me a horse, and Second-day morning, Sept. 5th, I set out for Hughes' River. Our company, at first, consisted of nine or ten persons, both men and women, all on horseback; among whom was Elder Asa Bee, pastor of the church on Hughes' River. This place is about twenty-four miles from New Milton, in a south-westerly direction, and is in Ritchie County, and, I believe, about ten miles from Harrisville, the county seat; situated below on the same river. This is comparatively a new settlement; though the church has been organized about twenty years. This church, though small in numbers, and occupying a very retired situation, presents a picture worthy of examination, and in many respects an example worthy of imitation. To them, their fellowship is no mere nominal affair. They hold meetings, besides those for worship, for investigation; in which they discuss all questions of interest, either in principle or practice, making the word of God the standard of authority. They have carried with them into these discussions a desire, not simply to gain a victory, but to arrive at truthful conclusions; and they have never failed to agree, in the end, on any question that has arisen. No one enters into any important business transaction, without the advice and consent of the church; and when, in following such advice, a loss is incurred, they are mutual sharers in sustaining it, in proportion to what each is worth. They publicly announce their purpose never to resort to the civil law for the recovery of debts, yet they seldom lose any thing by that means. They also agree that change of style in dress, &c., shall be by common consent, and on principles of utility.

I remained here one night, preaching in the evening; and the next day started on my return to New Milton. Eld. Lewis Bond an old minister, who was not able to attend the Association, having heard that I was present, had sent word that he wished me to come to his house and preach, and the appointment had been made for this afternoon, Sept. 6th. He lives not far from the North Fork of Hughes' River, where there was once a church, which has become extinct. I think he was the minister to this church. As my way was principally through forest, without any road, Bro. Asa Bee accompanied me as a guide. The distance is about ten or twelve miles. Though the house stands alone in a small opening in the forest, there were as many present as could be comfortably seated in the room. But few of them, I think, however, were Sabbath-keepers. After enjoying a short social interview with the old man and his family, and partaking of their hospitality, we went home with Bro. John Bee, and spent the night.

The next day, with my host for a guide five or six miles out to a more public road, I returned to New Milton, and thence to Green Brier Run, where I had an appointment for the evening. This settlement, I should think, is a little north of east from New Milton, on the road to New Salem; not far from midway between them. The people here are mostly connected with the New Salem church. There is a log meeting-house here, in which they sometimes used to worship, which is now nearly or quite neglected. Elder Peter Davis lives here, whose ordination is mentioned in a Missionary Report of Eld. John Green, published since my return, in the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial. He is the minister of the New Salem church. He has reached an advanced age, and feels that his public labors are nearly finished. His life has been laborious. Besides providing for himself and family, with his own hands, he preached much, for many years, not only in all the settlements occupied by our people in the State, but many other places.

After the service, I went home with Eld. Davis, who the next day, Sept. 8th, went with his horse and buggy, and carried me to Lost Creek; going via New Salem, to meet an appointment for me there at 11 o'clock A. M. This church (New Salem) is the oldest in the Association. Its organization dates back one hundred and eight years; though it has not stood here all that time. It was organized on Squam River, New Jersey, in 1745; and some time after, the main body of the church emigrated to Woodbridgetown, in the south-west part of Pennsylvania. After remaining there a while, they removed some sixty or seventy years since to this place. The meeting-house is an ancient looking structure, of hewed logs. There is a gallery in it, which, however, seems to have fallen into disuse. The gloomy aspect of the house is, perhaps, too true an index to the condition of the church. It is a sad picture, to see a church that has withstood the vicissitudes of more than a century, feebly struggling for existence. Truly "the harvest is plenteous, but the laborers are few.

Premium of Five Hundred Dollars for a Work on Peace.—The American Tract Society announce that a premium of five hundred dollars from an aged friend is offered to be awarded to the author of the best approved treatise of not less than 300 nor more 400 pages, on Peace. The character of the work as defined by the donor, must not radical, opposing all war as per se, sinful. It must, moreover, accord, in its sentiments, with evangelical principles. The premium is to be awarded by a committee consisting of Rev. Joseph W. Parker, D.D., of Cambridge, Mass., Hon. William J. Hubbard of Boston, and Rev. Asa D. Smith, D.D., of New York; and the aged friend has pledged a sum sufficient to perpetuate the circulation of said volume in the Evangelical Family Library of the American Tract Society. Manuscripts may be presented until January 1, 1855, and may be addressed (post paid) to Rev. Seth Bliss, 28 Cornhill, Boston, or to William A. Hallock, 150 Nassau street, New York.

DR. ROBINSON AND THE SUNDAY ARGUMENT.

All who are conversant with the argument for a change of the Sabbath, have not failed to notice, that every circumstance that can be warped into an argument for the change is freely used. Hence the journey performed by the two disciples to Emmaus, and the meeting of Christ with them, is made to add strength to the argument—as if the meeting of Christ with them was proof that He wished to add His divine sanction to the day as a Sabbath. And it is sometimes gravely asserted, that Christ at this interview instructed his disciples in the doctrine of the change. A variety of expressions of Christ have been forced into this service, and many doubtless feel that in this they have some proof of the change.

Dr. Robinson, in his visit to Palestine, has come very near to demonstrating that the journey to Emmaus, by the disciples, and the interview of Christ with them, could not have been consistent with any notion of Sabbath-keeping, under either dispensation. Moreover, his argument proves, (whether he intended it or not,) that Jesus Christ and two of his disciples secularized the first day of the week on which it is said that Christ arose from the grave. With this fact proved, it must be a desperate case that would seek to establish the sanctity of Sunday from the precept or example of Jesus Christ. We have never yet found the Saviour taking both sides of a disputed question, nor seeking to establish what he disowned.

But we will give the conclusions at which the Doctor arrives as to the distance of Emmaus from Jerusalem, and leave him and others to judge as to the sacredness of that day on which Christ and his disciples performed such a journey. We quote from the Bibliotheca Sacra for July, 1853, article; "From Antipatris to Emmaus," by E. Robinson, D.D.

The Extract.

Descending gradually, we came at 7.40 to the village of 'Amwâs, lying on the gradual declivity of a rocky hill, sufficiently high to have an extensive view of the western plain. It is now a poor hamlet, consisting of a few mean houses. There are two fountains or wells of living water; one just by the village, and the other a little down the shallow valley west. The former is probably the one mentioned by Sozomen in the fifth century, by Theophanes in the sixth, and again by Willibald in the eighth, as situated in a spot where three ways met (in trivio,) and as possessing healing qualities.

We noticed, also, fragments of two marble columns, and were told of sarcophagi near by, which had recently been opened. But the chief relic of antiquity consists in the remains of an ancient church, just south of the village, originally a fine structure built of large hewn stones. The circular eastern end is still standing, as also the two western corners, but the intervening parts lie in ruins. Such is the present state of the ancient Nicopolis!

That 'Amwâs represents the ancient Emmaus or Nicopolis, situated at the foot of the mountains, and according to the Itin. Hieros, twenty-two Roman miles distant from Jerusalem and ten from Lydda, I believe no one doubts. The name does not occur in the Old Testament, but from the first book of Maccabees and from Josephus we learn, that here Judas Maccabæus defeated the Syrian general Gorgias; that Emmaus, having been dismantled, was afterwards fortified by the Syrian Bacchides; that under the Romans it became the head of a toparchy; was afterwards reduced to slavery by Cassius; and at last was burned by order of Varus, just after the death of Herod the Great. The place appears not to have received the name Nicopolis until the third century after Christ, when it was again rebuilt by the exertions of the writer Julius Africanus, who flourished about A. D. 220. This name, along with Emmaus, it continued to bear during the centuries of the crusades. Yet the writers of that epoch, and later travelers, who speak of a Castellum Emmaus, (from the Vulgate,) evidently had in view, as we shall see further on, the fortress at el-Lâtrôn, a mile distant, on the Jerusalem road. The village 'Amwâs, though in sight from that road, would seem hitherto to have been actually visited by no traveler

A question of a good deal of historical interest connects itself with this place, viz., Whether it stands in any relation to the Emmaus of the New Testament, whither the two disciples were going from Jerusalem, as Jesus drew near and went with them, on the day of his resurrection? As the text of the New Testament now stands, the distance of that place from Jerusalem is said to have been about sixty stadia; which, if correct, of course excludes all idea of any connection with the present 'Amwâs, the latter being at least one hundred and sixty stadia distant from the Holy City.

Yet there can be no doubt, that in the earliest period of which we have any record, after the apostolic age, the opinion prevailed in the church, that Nicopolis (as it was then called) was the scene of that narrative. Both Eusebius and Jerome, in the fourth century, are explicit on this point; the one a leading bishop and historian, the other a scholar and translator of the Scriptures. Indeed, they seem to have known of no other interpretation, nor is there a trace of any other in any ancient writer. The same opinion continued general down through succeeding ages until the commencement of the fourteenth century, when slight traces began to appear of the later idea, which fixed an Emmaus at Kubeibeh, a transfer of which there is no earlier vestige, and for which there was no possible ground, except to find an Emmaus at about sixty stadia from the Holy City.

Thus for thirteen centuries did the interpretation current in the whole church regard the Emmaus of the New Testament as identical with Nicopolis. This was not the voice of mere tradition, but the well-considered judgment of men of learning and critical skill, resident in the country, acquainted with the place in question, and occupied in investigating and describing the scriptural topography of the Holy Land. The objections which lie against this view have been well presented by Reland and others, and are the four following:

First. The express statement of Luke, that Emmaus was distant from Jerusalem about sixty stadia. Such is, indeed, the present reading, as found in all the editions and in most of the manuscripts of the New Testament, that have come down to us. But it is no less true, that several manuscripts, and some of them of high authority, read here one hundred and sixty; and thus point to Nicopolis. This may then have been the current reading in the days of Eusebius and Jerome. There seems, indeed, to be a strong probability that it actually was so; since, other wise, those fathers, in searching for the Emmaus of Luke, had only to seek at the distance of sixty stadia from Jerusalem, in order to find it. We therefore may draw, at least, this definite conclusion, viz., that in their day such an Emmaus was unknown; and, also, that probably their copies read one hundred and sixty stadia. It may have been, that the word or numeral letter signifying a hundred had early begun to be dropped from the text by a lapse of transcribers; and that this was increased as copies were multiplied in other lands, by copyists who knew nothing of Palestine; until at length, by degress, the omission became current in the manuscripts. Indeed, few if any of the manuscripts now extant were written in Palestine. There exist likewise, in the New Testament, other examples of erroneous readings, which have, doubtless, in like manner crept in through the error of transcribers.

Second. Josephus relates, that Vespasian (or Titus) assigned in Palestine a place of habitation for eight hundred men, whom he had dismissed from his army; it was called Emmaus, and was distant from Jerusalem sixty stadia. This, it is said, confirms the present reading of the New Testament. But since, as is well known, the works of Josephus were copied in a later age almost exclusively by Christian transcribers, this passage would very naturally be conformed to the current reading in Luke, while it is also true, that several manuscripts of Josephus still read here thirty stadia. This at least shows the reading to be variable, and therefore doubtful; so that it can have no weight in determining the text of the New Testament. Indeed, the original reading may just as well have been one hundred and sixty.

Third. The Emmaus of Luke and Josephus, it is said, is called a village; while Nicopolis was a city. But the word employed by Luke signifies strictly a town without walls, a country-town, as distinguished from a fortified city; and that used by Josephus denotes a place, and is also put for a fortified post or town. Emmaus had been laid in ashes by Varus shortly after the death of Herod, and would seem not to have been fully rebuilt until the third century, when it received the name of Nicopolis. When Luke wrote, therefore, it was probably still a place partially in ruins and without walls, a fitting post for a colony of disbanded soldiers.

Fourth. The distance of Nicopolis from Jerusalem is too great, it is said, to admit of the return of the two disciples the same evening, so as to meet the assembled apostles. This, however, would depend, not so much upon the distance, as upon the time when they set off. They "rose up the same hour," and naturally returned in haste, to make known their glad tidings; although, with all their haste, they could not well have traversed the distance in less than five hours. It was not yet evening when they arrived at Emmaus, and if they set off to return even as late as six o'clock, which at that season would be about sunset, they might reach the city by eleven o'clock. The apostles were assembled "for fear of the Jews," not for an evening meal; or, if so, this had already been long ended, for Jesus afterwards inquires, if they had there any food. It was evidently late. There is, therefore, nothing impossible or improbable in the supposition, that the two had hastened back a long distance late at night, perhaps with much bodily effort, to declare to their brethren the wonderful things of which they had been witnesses. A like amount of travel, on an extraordinary occasion, would be nothing strange, even at the present day.

The case then may be thus presented. On the one hand, the reading of good manuscripts gives the distance of Emmaus from Jerusalem at one hundred and sixty stadia, at which point there was a place called Emmaus, which still exists as the village 'Amwâs; and all this is further supported by the critical judgment of learned men residing in the country near the time; as also by the unbroken tradition of the first thirteen centuries. On the other hand, there is the current reading of sixty stadia in most of the present manuscripts, written out of Palestine, supported only by a doubtful reading of Josephus, but with no place existing, now or at the end of the third century, to which this specification can be referred. So far as it regards the New Testament, it is a question between two various readings; one, now the current one, but with no other valid support; the other, supported likewise by manuscripts, by facts, by the judgment of early scholars, and by early and unbroken tradition. After long and repeated consideration, I am disposed to acquiesce in the judgment of Eusebius and Jerome.

Bible-house Corner-stone.—The cornerstone of the building now being erected in Nassau-st., New York, by the American and Foreign Bible Society, was laid on the 1st inst., without ceremony—public services with reference to the event being reserved for the Monthly Board Meeting on the evening of the 9th inst. At that meeting Dr. Welch delivered a lengthy address, reviewing the past history and present prosperous condition of the Society. The following extract will be read with interest:—

"From the reports of our Society it may be learned that, during the brief period of its existence, it has received and disbursed more than half a million of dollars, of which the sum appropriated in cash to the foreign work amounts to $264,740. So carefully and wisely has this been dispensed, that not less than thirty-five different languages have, by distinct appropriations from our Treasury, been aided to receive and widely diffuse, in whole or in important integral portions, the oracles of God. Many of these had never before been thus honored and blessed. The completion of the entire Bible in the Burman and Karen languages, at the expense of our Society, both for translating and publishing abroad this word, demands of us devout thanksgiving unto God.

"It is impracticable to ascertain the exact number of volumes which have thus been printed and distributed by our appropriations in foreign lands, but they are known to exceed half a million; for a few of the last and most successful years of our operations they have amounted to nearly 100,000 a year. They have embraced, in the aggregate, seven of the languages of Europe, twenty-one of Asia, six of North America, and one of Africa. Combining our own efforts with what had been done by Baptist missionaries and translators of the last half century, into whose labors we have been permitted, yea constrained to enter, and an aggregate of more than sixty languages and distinct dialects have in this period been enriched with the revelation of God by our and their instrumentality.

THE JEWS IN CHINA.

Some time ago, a Mr. Cohen, of California, published a statement showing the depressed condition of a remnant of Jews at Kai-fung-foo, China, and expressing the opinion that it would be practicable for Jewish missionaries to visit and greatly benefit them. This statement awakened considerable interest among the Jews of the United States and Great Britain, and led to a proposition to send missionaries among them. As a preparatory step, the Rev. Dr. Adler, of London, addressed a letter of inquiry to a Jewish firm in Canton, the answer to which we give below. It will be seen that they are unacquainted with the Jewish merchants who visited our missionaries at Shanghae, and consider the project of a mission impracticable.

Canton, July 21st, 1853.

Sir,—We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your much-respected letter, dated the 21st April last, requesting us to furnish you with such information as we are enabled to collect, regarding the Jews in China, their moral as well as their spiritual condition, their number and abodes, and whether it would be practicable and feasible to send out zealous and able ministers for the purpose of teaching them the principles of the religion of their ancestors, &c.

In reply to which we beg leave to state that we are hardly qualified to satisfy your reverence on that point, regarding which ourselves, and most, if not all, of our neighbors are quite in the dark, there being no means even of establishing inquiries regarding them, unless through the Chinese missionaries who travel and reside in the interior of China; and even amongst them, it seems little has been said or heard on the subject, except what was printed in a pamphlet last year, by the Bishop of Hong-Kong, of which your reverence will, no doubt, have heard. Yet we may continue to say, with respect to the information obtained through local newspapers, as to the Jews here sending their children to be taught by the missionaries, we think it is mere conjecture, as we do not know or hear of any such established school or institution in China.

As to our opinion on the probable result of able ministers being sent out here for the purpose of recalling and receiving into the bosom of Judaism all such scattered brethren, we may beg to state, that little or nothing could be done, unless such ministers are masters of the Chinese language, and have means to get into the interior of the country, where they may, by constant and habitual intercourse with the natives, meet with some of them; but this is, we think, also impracticable at the present time, that traveling into the interior is attended with great risk and difficulty, in consequence of insurrection and disturbance in almost all the provinces, where the objects of the inquiries are most likely to be met with. Chinese jealousy will not admit of a stranger being in open commerce with the natives, and the eyes of the Government and public vigilance will, therefore, be an unsurmountable barrier to any undertaking, until political affairs, and the present civil war, are brought to an end and substantial stability.

This is all we have to inform you at present, and if further inquiries put us in better light of the subject, we shall do ourselves the pleasure of communicating to you.

Meantime, we remain, with due respect, sir, your reverence's most obedient servants,

David Sasson, Sons & Co.

Baptist Mission in Burmah.—The Macedonian publishes communications from Rangoon, Bassein and Maulmain, of great interest. At Rangoon the Spirit seems to be poured out in copious effusions. More than fifty have been baptized in a little more than a month, and the number of earnest inquirers was never greater. At Tavoy the printing of the Karen Bible had advanced, on the 21st of August, to the middle of the gospel of John. The churches were peaceful and prosperous. Mr. Thomas, prevented from traveling by the rains, was teaching a class of sixteen young men, a majority of them preparing for the ministry. At Maulmain, Dr. Wade had entered on his duties as teacher of the Karen Theological School, in addition to which he preaches every week and performs other work, with the vigor of a young man. A letter from Mr. Granger describes a trip up the Irrawadi. He speaks with surprise of the populousness of the country, almost innumerable towns and villages lining the river and its branches, presenting abundant places accessible in the rains as well as in the dry season. Dr. Mason, having completed the translation of the Karen scriptures, is about to embark for this country, in such infirm health as to make it doubtful whether he can survive the voyage.

Presbyterian Mission at Fuhchu.—At the recent monthly meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the semi-annual report from the mission at Fuhchu, China, was read. The missionaries are all in good health, and grateful for protection in the midst of disorders and alarms. Rumors of threatened attacks from the insurgents had frequently produced great excitement; trade was deranged, and supplies of provisions were, in a measure, cut off. Attempts to plunder were made, but the Lieutenant Governor with decision and firmness repressed them and maintained order. The state of things was unfavorable, but their work had suffered no serious interruption. The girls' school, under the care of Mr. and Mrs. Cummings, was closed for a time; the two boys' schools and another for girls went on as usual. An average number of 85 children received instruction in these schools. Preaching is conducted in the four chapels of the mission, in houses and school-rooms, and by the way-side. An advantageous use is made of native help in these services. Special attention is devoted to the preparation of books in colloquial style, in which the Chinese light literature is written for the masses.

Munificent Bequests.—Anson G. Phelps, of New York, recently deceased, bequeathed over five hundred thousand dollars to religious and charitable objects. After providing amply for his widow he left $100,000 to each of his children, $10,000 to each of his grand-children, and an additional $5,000 to each of them, to be paid by the executors, with the injunction from him to use the increase of this fund sacredly for benevolent purposes, and transmit to their heirs with the same injunction, and after making several bequests to relations, he left the following sums to various benevolent objects, providing for their payment by installments during a term of years:

American Bible Society	$100,000
Am. Board of Com. for Foreign Missions	100,000
American Home Missionary Society	100,000
Literary and theological education in Liberia, Africa	50,000
Union Theological Seminary, N. Y.	5,000

Half-Orphan Society, Fourth-av.	1,000
Colored Orphan Society	1,000
Cong. Church, Simsbury, Conn., for the poor	1,000
Total	$371,000

In addition to the above Mr. Phelps, just previous to his death, placed in the hands of his son $100,000, the interest to be used at his discretion for the spread of the Gospel, and the principal eventually to be invested equally for the benefit of the American Bible Societies, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. This disposition of Mr. Phelps' property, including the amount given to each of his twenty-two grandchildren, makes the munificent bequest of $581,000, for religious and benevolent purposes.

Charitable Bequests.—The late Russell H. Nevins, of this City, made provision in his will for the following legacies to benevolent and charitable institutions:—

New York Hospital	$5,000
New York State Colonization Society	3,000
American Bible Society	2,000
American Tract Society	2,000
New York City Tract Society	2,000

Total	$26,000

We understand that the estimated value of the estate of the deceased is 600,000. The will is dated on the 3d of Nov. last.

Baptist Churches in London.—The oldest Baptist church in London was formed in 1633. In not a few of the churches of that great metropolis, Antinomianism and its attendant indifference or opposition to missions and religious enterprises generally, still exist, and their bitter fruit is manifest. A correspondent of the New York Recorder says:—

Mr. Noel's church, from peculiar circumstances in its history, under his predecessor, Rev. J. Harrington Evans, tending to isolate it from denominational action, is found among the number of unassociated churches; and a noble exception it is, contributing its thousands of dollars annually to the mission fund, and in most respects a healthy and energetic community; but among the crowd it stands alone, showing their insignificance the more by comparison. Of the churches named, not more than half make any collection for the Baptist Mission—a sure sign of internal unsoundness.
